PER CURIAM.

Over the past 15 years, Andrew W. Alexander and his parents have made numerous frivolous claims to ownership and a homestead exemption in real property in St. Paul, Minnesota.<sup>1</sup> In 2011, the bankruptcy trustees evicted them and tried to sell the property. The bankruptcy court<sup>2</sup> authorized the sale free and clear of any encumbrances. Alexander filed a lis pendens, delaying the sale. The trustees moved for $25,000 in damages, plus attorney's fees and expenses. The bankruptcy court scheduled a hearing and discovery on the motion, but Alexander and his attorney, Daniel L.M. Kennedy, refused to cooperate. The bankruptcy court imposed sanctions, including (1) a default judgment of $25,000 against Alexander and Kennedy, jointly and severally; (2) $10,184.70 in attorney's fees and expenses against Alexander and Kennedy, jointly and severally; and (3) $10,000 against Kennedy individually. Alexander appealed to the district court,<sup>3</sup> which affirmed. In re Stephens, No. 12-2775/12-2785, 2013 WL 3465281 (D. Minn. July 10, 2013)

(unpublished). He now appeals to this court, attacking the bankruptcy court's jurisdiction and sanctions.

Upon careful review of the record and the arguments on appeal, we agree with the findings and conclusions of the district court and the bankruptcy court. See Nick v. Morgan's Foods, Inc., 270 F.3d 590, 594 (8th Cir. 2001) ("We review sanction orders under the abuse of discretion standard."); *Moog World Trade Corp. v.
