COMMONWEALTH vs. JAHMAL BRANGAN.

Hampden. April 7, 2016. - August 12, 2016.

Present: Gants, C.J., Spina, Cordy, Botsford, Duffly, Lenk, & Hines, JJ.¹

Practice, Criminal, Appeal by Commonwealth, Mistrial.

Indictment found and returned in the Superior Court Department on February 25, 2014.

The case was tried before Mark D. Mason, J., and a mistrial was ordered by him.

The Supreme Judicial Court granted an application for direct appellate review.

Amal Bala, Assistant District Attorney, for the Commonwealth.

Merritt Schnipper for the defendant.

CORDY, J. On March 13, 2015, a jury convicted the defendant of armed robbery while masked, in violation of G. L. c. 265, § 17. During closing argument, the defendant objected to a series of the prosecutor's statements, and at its conclusion moved for a mistrial, claiming that those statements constituted prejudicial error. The trial judge, who had given curative instructions in response to the defendant's objections, took the defendant's motion under advisement, gave the jury final instructions, and placed the case in their hands for deliberations.

After the jury returned a guilty verdict, the judge solicited briefs from both parties on the prejudicial error issue and held a nonevidentiary hearing. He then granted the defendant's motion for a mistrial,² ordering that the defendant's indictment would stand for retrial. The Commonwealth sought an appeal of the judge's decision pursuant to G. L. c. 278, § 28E, suggesting that the judge had granted a motion for a new trial, as opposed to a mistrial. The case was entered in the Appeals Court, and we allowed the defendant's motion for direct appellate review.

On appeal, the Commonwealth argues that, although an order granting a mistrial is generally not appealable, we have jurisdiction to hear its appeal pursuant to G. L. c. 278, § 28E, because the defendant's motion, granted after the verdict, was akin to a motion for relief from a guilty verdict under the ² The judge also denied the Commonwealth's motion to stay proceedings pending an appeal after concluding that the Commonwealth had no right to appeal his order.

Massachusetts Rules of Criminal Procedure.³ See Mass. R. Crim. P. 25 (c), as amended, 420 Mass. 1502 (1995) (right of appeal where motion for required finding of not guilty granted after verdict of guilty); Mass. R. Crim. P. 30 (c) (8), as appearing in 435 Mass. 1501 (2001) (right of appeal where motion for new trial granted). Because we conclude that the timing of the order granting the defendant's motion for a mistrial, brought prior to the verdict, did not change the character of that motion, the Commonwealth is not entitled to an appeal.

1. Background. We summarize the facts in the light most favorable to the Commonwealth. On January 17, 2014, a bank in Springfield was robbed. The robber passed a note to the bank teller stating that he had a weapon and demanding that she give him money. The robber fled the bank after obtaining less than $1,000. The police arrived at the bank a short time later. The responding officer instructed the bank employees to leave the note untouched. The note was collected as evidence and processed for fingerprints within hours of the commission of the crime. The defendant was arrested after his thumbprint was found on the note.

At trial, a police officer testified that, in addition to the defendant's thumb print, the note was marked by a "right hand writer's palm" print. While the palm print was unusable for purposes of seeking a match with the defendant, the officer opined that, because of the position and orientation of the print, the person who wrote the note was likely left-handed.

During the Commonwealth's closing argument, the prosecutor, in an attempt to link the defendant to the writer's palm print left on the robbery note, stated to the jury: "it would be impossible to write the note right-handed and put that mark on the note. Left-handed, someone holding the paper [sic]. You've got to watch [the defendant] the whole trial take his notes left-handed." The defendant objected to the prosecutor's statement on the basis that evidence of the defendant's left-handedness was not introduced through a witness at trial.⁴ The judge struck the statement and gave curative instructions to the jury after the objection was made.⁵ As noted, the defendant orally moved for a mistrial at the end of the Commonwealth's closing argument, and the judge took the motion under advisement.

After the jury's guilty verdict was entered,⁶ the judge informed counsel that the defendant's motion for a mistrial remained pending. The defendant requested that his prior motion for a mistrial be both briefed and heard, which the judge allowed, explaining that the defendant should "reduce [his] motion for mistrial to writing." The judge also requested that any motions for postconviction relief be submitted in conjunction with the motion for a mistrial.

The defendant filed a brief in support of his motion for a mistrial. After a nonevidentiary hearing, the judge issued a detailed memorandum of decision allowing the defendant's motion for a mistrial and ordering a retrial. In his memorandum, the judge concluded as follows:

"[b]ased on personal observations at trial and the evidence before the jury, . . . the error went to the heart of [the defendant's] defense and did make a difference in the jury's conclusion. The error was prejudicial. Despite the Court's best efforts to immediately strike the prosecutor's comment and instruct the jury appropriately, no curative instruction would have been sufficient to mitigate the excessive nature of the prosecutor's comment. [The defendant] has overcome the presumption that the jury followed the Court's curative instructions pertaining to this issue."

The Commonwealth moved to stay proceedings subsequent to the issuance of the order allowing the defendant's motion for a mistrial.⁷ The judge denied the order, holding that a "[m]istrial where, as in this case, retrial has been ordered 'ordinarily is neither appealable by the Commonwealth nor a bar to retrial on double jeopardy grounds.'" Commonwealth v. Curtis, 53 Mass. App. Ct. 636, 639 [2002]. The Commonwealth now appeals the judge's order granting the defendant's motion for a mistrial, and argues that it is entitled to such appeal because the order came after the jury's verdict.

2. Discussion. a. Characterization of the motion.

Generally, when a mistrial is ordered upon a defendant's motion, such order is not appealable by the Commonwealth when a new trial is contemporaneously ordered because the order granting the mistrial does not dispose of the case with finality. See Commonwealth v. Lam Hue To, 391 Mass. 301, 310-311 (1984). Contrast Curtis, 53 Mass. App. Ct. at 639 (dismissal of complaint with prejudice pursuant to motion for mistrial reviewable because "[t]he essence of the judicial action was finality"). On the other hand, where a judge has granted a postverdict motion for a new trial, see Mass. R. Crim. P. 30 (b), 378 Mass. 896 (1979), or a postverdict motion for a required finding of not guilty, see Mass. R. Crim. P. 25 (b) (2), as amended, 420 Mass. 1502 (1995), that decision is appealable. See G. L. c. 278, § 28E. Therefore, whether the Commonwealth's appeal is properly before us turns on the procedural posture of the trial judge's order granting the defendant's motion for a mistrial.

The Commonwealth argues that the trial judge's decision to take the defendant's motion for a mistrial under advisement, coupled with the defendant's filing of a supplemental brief in support of it, turns this case from an average mistrial case into an order that is appealable. We disagree. There is no question that the judge intended to grant a mistrial. He had a "practice" of taking motions for a mistrial under advisement, acknowledged that the defendant's motion was still pending after the verdict, and, in his order, explicitly allowed the defendant's "[m]otion for [a] [m]istrial."⁸ However, "[i]n determining whether the Commonwealth may take an appeal from a judicial action, we look to the true nature of the action rather than to what it has been termed or to its particular form." Curtis, 53 Mass. App. Ct. at 639, citing Commonwealth v. Hosmer, 49 Mass. App. Ct. 188, 189-190 (2000) ("We are not bound by labels or checkmarks on a form"). See Commonwealth

v. Powers, 21 Mass. App. Ct. 570, 571 (1986), citing Commonwealth v. Preston, 393 Mass. 318, 322-323 (1984).

In support of its argument that the order directing that there be a retrial was a form of postverdict relief, the Commonwealth cites to Powers, supra. In Powers, 21 Mass. App. Ct. at 571, a mistrial was granted on the defendant's motion filed after the jury foreperson announced that the jury found the defendant guilty, but the jury's verdict slip was erroneously marked "not guilty." The Commonwealth appealed, arguing that it had the authority to do so on the basis that the defendant's motion, although labeled a motion for a mistrial, was truly a motion for a new trial. See id. at 571-572. The Appeals Court, noting that the motion was brought after the jury returned its verdict and that the judge, in ruling on the motion, referred to it as a motion for a new trial, held that the motion was "in the nature and substance of a motion for a new trial," and was thus appealable. Id. at 572.

The procedural posture of the motion in Powers differs significantly from that of the defendant's in the present case. Here, the defendant brought his motion for a mistrial as soon as procedurally possible, and well before the jury returned its verdict. The fact that the mistrial was granted after the verdict was not a result of when the motion was brought or any other action of the defendant, but instead due to the trial judge's decision to take the defendant's motion under advisement. We have previously condoned the practice of taking motions for mistrial under advisement until after the jury return their verdict, and we see no reason to depart from that position based on the circumstances presented in this case. See Commonwealth v. Murchison, 392 Mass. 273, 275 (1984) ("judge's decision to defer action on the defendant's motion for a mistrial until after the verdict was one of fairness and common sense").

Our conclusion is supported by the policy implications arising from a judge's decision to defer judgment on a defendant's motion for a mistrial in the present circumstances. Where a defendant's motion for a mistrial is brought during closing arguments and presents a close question, a judge's decision to defer ruling on the motion until after the jury return their verdict enhances judicial efficiency and preserves valuable judicial resources by "obviating the need for a retrial should the verdict result in an acquittal." See Robinson v. Commonwealth, 13 Va. App. 574, 577 (1992). See also Companiononi v. Tampa, 51 So. 3d 452, 455 (Fla. 2010), quoting Ed Ricke & Sons v. Green, 468 So. 2d 908, 910 (Fla. 1985) ("it is quite reasonable for a trial judge to reserve ruling [on a motion for a mistrial] until after the jury deliberates in the hope that the jurors can rise above the alleged prejudice and cure the error").⁹

That the judge took the defendant's motion under advisement was a reflection on the complexity of the issue. To allow such motion to be appealed simply because it was granted postverdict would be to change the character of the motion. Allowing the judge to take the motion under consideration affords the judge the opportunity to effectively balance the need to maintain judicial resources with the principles of fairness to which each criminal defendant is entitled. Because the defendant's motion cannot be characterized as a motion for relief from a guilty verdict pursuant to either rule 25 (b) (2) or rule 30 (b), the Commonwealth has no right to appeal the judge's order granting the defendant's motion for a mistrial and ordering that the defendant be retried.¹⁰

b. Double jeopardy. The defendant argues that he is entitled to an analysis of the sufficiency of the evidence in order to determine whether double jeopardy bars his retrial

⁹ Our endorsement of this practice in the circumstances of this case should not be construed as encouraging judges to defer acting on such motions based on errors that occur earlier in a trial where deferral would not necessarily promote the same policy of judicial economy.

pursuant to Berry v. Commonwealth, 393 Mass. 793 (1985). "The United States Constitution and Massachusetts common and statutory law protect criminal defendants from being twice placed in jeopardy for the same crime." Choy v. Commonwealth, 456 Mass. 146, 149, cert. denied, 562 U.S. 986 (2010). See Commonwealth v. Beal, 474 Mass. 341, 353-354 (2016), quoting Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1, 11 (1978) (Massachusetts common-law double jeopardy rule "forbids a second trial for the purpose of affording the prosecution another opportunity to supply evidence which it failed to muster in the first proceeding").

The judge, in granting the motion for a mistrial, determined that the Commonwealth could retry the defendant, because the prosecutor's misconduct did not reach such a level as to warrant dismissal of the indictment against the defendant due to double jeopardy. See Murchison, 392 Mass. at 275-276. The defendant did not appeal the trial judge's conclusion that double jeopardy would not bar a retrial, nor did he file a motion to dismiss his case based on the insufficiency of the evidence at the first trial. The issue is therefore not properly before us on appeal. See Pena v. Commonwealth, 426 Mass. 1015, 1016 & n.2 (1998) (double jeopardy appeal not procedurally sound unless Commonwealth has sought to retry defendant and defendant has filed motion to dismiss).

3. Conclusion. The trial judge's order granting the defendant's motion for a mistrial is not appealable, and the indictment stands for retrial.

So ordered.
