OPINION*

* This disposition is not an opinion of the full Court and pursuant to I.O.P. 5.7 does not constitute binding precedent.

PER CURIAM

In June 2017, pro se litigant Reza Farzan removed certain family-law proceedings, in which he is the defendant, from New Jersey state court to the District Court.¹ On July 18, 2017, the District Court, concluding that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction over those proceedings, entered an order remanding the case back to New Jersey state court. On August 1, 2017, Farzan moved the District Court to reconsider its decision. The District Court denied that motion on August 3, 2017, and this appeal followed.²

When, as here, a district court remands a case to state court on jurisdictional grounds, we generally lack jurisdiction to review that decision, see 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d); Things Remembered, Inc. v. Petrarca, 516 U.S. 124, 127-28 (1995), and the district court's related decision denying reconsideration, see Agostini v. Piper Aircraft Corp., 729 F.3d 350, 355 (3d Cir. 2013). Although we do have jurisdiction to review the limited question of whether removal in this case was warranted under either 28 U.S.C. § 1442 or § 1443(1), see 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d), we answer that question in the negative.³ Section 1442 applies to lawsuits brought against federal officers or agencies, see 28 U.S.C.

¹ It appears that these proceedings began several years ago, and revolve around Farzan's obligation to pay child support.

§ 1442, while § 1443(1) applies only in the rare case when the defendant seeking removal is being deprived of “specific civil rights stated in terms of racial equality” and cannot enforce those rights in state court. Davis v. Glanton, 107 F.3d 1044, 1047 (3d Cir. 1997) (quoting Georgia v. Rachel, 384 U.S. 780, 792 (1966)); see 28 U.S.C. § 1443(1).

Because those situations are not present here, we find no error in the District Court’s decision to remand.⁴

In light of the above, we will dismiss this appeal in part, and to the extent that we have jurisdiction, we will affirm the District Court’s July 18, 2017 and August 3, 2017 orders. Farzan’s “Expedited Motion to Request for Injunction,” submitted on July 14, 2018, is denied.
