acceptance of responsibility under U.S.S.G. § 3E1.1. We will “affirm the denial of a reduction for acceptance of responsibility unless it is without foundation, a standard of review more deferential than the clearly erroneous standard.” United States v. Lord, 915 F.3d 1009, 1017 (5th Cir. 2019) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

While represented by counsel, Herrera filed numerous pro se pleadings in the district court in which he accused the Government of engaging in misconduct and the district court of improperly participating in plea negotiations. Herrera filed pro se objections to the presentence report (PSR), in which he alleged that the probation officer willingly included untrue, inaccurate, and unreliable information in the PSR; that the transcripts of calls between him and a confidential information (CI), as well as calls between the CI and another party, were altered by the Government or otherwise fabricated; and that the consent form to search his property was forged. He also denied statements he made to agents following his arrest, and he accused the case agent of providing false information in federal court proceedings. Such conduct is inconsistent with acceptance of responsibility. See § 3E1.1, comment. (n.1(A)).

In addition, after pleading guilty, Herrera maintained his entrapment defense. We have repeatedly held that an entrapment defense is inconsistent with acceptance of responsibility because it “is a challenge to criminal intent and thus to culpability.” United States v. Partida, 385 F.3d 546, 564 (5th Cir. 2004) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). Further, Herrera waited until just before his trial date to plead guilty, thereby forcing the Government to use time and resources preparing for trial. Such behavior also counsels against acceptance of responsibility. See United States v. Wilder, 15 F.3d 1292, 1299 (5th Cir. 1994); § 3E1.1, comment. (n.1(H)). Accordingly, the district court’s determination that Herrera’s conduct did not warrant an acceptance of responsibility reduction is not without foundation in the record. See Lord, 915 F.3d at 1017.

The judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED.
