LARRY L. LITTLE,
Plaintiff-Appellant,

v.

MINITUBISHI MOTORS NORTH
AMERICA, INC.,
Defendant-Appellee.

Appeal from the United States
District Court for the Central District of Illinois.

No. 04 C 1034

Joe Billy McDade,
Judge.

O R D E R

Larry Little, an African American, sued his former employer, Mitsubishi Motors North America, Inc., alleging that it discriminated against him on the basis of his race when it laid him off as part of a reduction in force ("RIF"). The district court granted summary judgment to Mitsubishi, and Mr. Little appeals. We affirm.

* After an examination of the briefs and the record, we have concluded that oral argument is unnecessary. Thus, the appeals are submitted on the briefs and the record. See FED. R. APP. P. 34(a)(2).

Except as noted, the facts are undisputed. Mr. Little was hired by Mitsubishi in November 2000 as a group leader in the Final Manufacturing department of Mitsubishi's facility in Normal, Illinois. In 2004, Mitsubishi made a business decision to reduce its workforce to offset poor sales and reduced profits. Approximately 19% of the non-union workforce (92 employees) at the Normal facility were laid off in the RIF. To select which employees would be laid off, Mitsubishi used an evaluation procedure whereby managers rated every employee subject to the RIF in five weighted categories: universal competencies (40%), job-specific competencies (40%), performance history (5%), relevant work experience (10%), and education (5%). A "total retention score" was calculated based on the weighted factors. Mitsubishi laid off the employees with the lowest total retention scores in a given job. Mr. Little received the lowest total retention score among the 33 group leaders in the Final Manufacturing department and was laid off.

Mr. Little sued Mitsubishi for race discrimination that allegedly occurred both during his employment and when he was laid off as part of the RIF. After discovery, Mitsubishi moved for summary judgment, which the district court granted. Mr. Little timely appealed.¹

We review a district court's grant of summary judgment de novo. Salas v. Wis. Dep't of Corr., 493 F.3d 913, 921 (7th Cir. 2007). Mr. Little submits that the district court improperly granted summary judgment when it (1) ignored a genuine issue of material fact about whether the RIF was pretextual; (2) erroneously concluded that he abandoned his claims of harassment, retaliation and discrimination that occurred during his employment; and (3) improperly determined that he was not credible. We address each argument in turn.

Mr. Little first contends that the district court erroneously concluded that he failed to demonstrate that Mitsubishi's proffered reason for laying him off was pretextual. See McDonnell-Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792, 802-04 (1973); Forrester v. Rauland-Borg Corp., 453 F.3d 416, 417 (7th Cir. 2006). To avoid summary judgment Mr. Little must show that Mitsubishi's proffered reason—that he was laid off because his total retention score was the lowest of all group leaders in his department—is a lie. Johnson v. Nordstrom, Inc., 260 F.3d 727, 732 (7th Cir. 2001). Mitsubishi may be "mistaken, cruel, unethical, out of [its] head or downright irrational," but so long as it really believed that Mr. Little legitimately earned the lowest retention score, its reason for laying him off was not pretextual. Griffin v. Sisters of Saint Francis, Inc., 489 F.3d 838, 845 (7th Cir. 2007) (citation omitted).

The only way Mr. Little attempts to prove pretext is by showing that two white group leaders in the same department with poorer performance histories received higher total retention scores than he did. However, Mr. Little does not dispute that performance history was worth only 5% of the total retention score, nor does he offer any evidence showing that the percentage given to that category was discriminatory. Mr. Little furthermore does not dispute that he received lower scores than the two white group leaders in the more heavily weighted categories. Thus, Mr. Little's evidence falls far short of the threshold necessary to raise an inference that Mitsubishi did not honestly believe that Mr. Little's total retention score was genuinely the lowest among all group leaders in his department.

Mr. Little next submits that the district court improperly concluded that he abandoned his claims attacking Mitsubishi's treatment of him during his employment. In addition to his claim regarding the RIF, Mr. Little's complaint alleged discrimination, retaliation and harassment that allegedly occurred during his employment. Mitsubishi sought summary judgment on all of Mr. Little's claims. Although Mr. Little had the burden to demonstrate that a genuine issue of fact existed as to each of them, see Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e)(2), he failed to present facts or develop any legal arguments on these issues; his response to Mitsubishi's motion focused exclusively on his RIF claim. Thus, as the district court correctly recognized, Mr. Little abandoned his claims regarding discrimination, harassment and retaliation that occurred during his employment. See Hicks v. Midwest Transit, Inc., 500 F.3d 647, 653-54 (7th Cir. 2007).

Finally, Mr. Little suggests that the district court made an adverse credibility determination at the summary judgment stage when it mentioned Mr. Little's history of filing discrimination complaints. If the district court did make a credibility finding, that, of course, would be improper. See Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 255 (1986); Washington v. Hauptert, 481 F.3d 543, 550 (7th Cir. 2007). However, the district court expressly stated that it was not making any credibility determination and chastised Mitsubishi for attempting "to sway this Court's judgment" by mentioning the "unnecessary and immaterial" facts regarding Mr. Little's prior complaints. R.120 at 8 n.4. Thus, we take the district court at its word that it made no credibility determination.
