ORDER

This court's opinion, filed April 30, 2009, is amended by adding additional language to footnote 2 (565 F.3d at 1114). The existing text in footnote 2 will become the first paragraph of the footnote and the new language follows, such that the entire footnote reads:

In this appeal of a summary judgment, PCA and Experian argued only that § 1681b(a)(3)(A) authorized PCA to obtain Pintos's credit report. Thus, we need not determine whether PCA had a permissible purpose under any other § 1681b subsection. On remand, Defendants may argue that PCA was authorized to obtain Pintos's report under a different subsection.

In the briefs on the merits, oral argument, petitions for rehearing, and response to petitions for rehearing, there was no argument based on 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681a(m) and 1681b(c). The parties did not appear to view those provisions to be relevant to this case. During our court's consideration of the petitions for rehearing en banc, it was suggested that these provisions, though drafted at a different time and aimed at a different situation, might shed light on the meaning of the relevant statute, § 1681b(a)(3)(A), so we requested supplemental briefs on that subject. The supplemental briefs have not persuaded us to change our opinion.

Those other provisions, §§ 1681a(m) and 1681b(c), were added in 1996 to permit lenders and insurance companies to solicit for business by purchasing lists and limited information about customers who match certain criteria (such as zip code and credit score) from credit reporting agencies. The "prescreened" customers could then be sent, for example, a "pre-approved" credit card solicitation. Pintos did not authorize the reporting agency to supply her report and the transaction did not consist of "a firm offer of credit or insurance," under § 1681b(c). Nobody contends otherwise.

At the same time, it should be clear that we do not opine on the meaning or scope of 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681a(m) and 1681b(c) or on the practice of obtaining information from credit reporting agencies to permit the extension of offers to prescreened customers, which the parties to our case agree is authorized by those statutes. A case presenting those questions is not before us.

A judge of the court called for a vote on the petitions for rehearing en banc. A vote was taken, and a majority of the active judges of the court failed to vote for en banc rehearing. Fed. R. App. P. 35.

The petitions for rehearing en banc are DENIED. No further petitions for rehearing may be filed.

Chief Judge KOZINSKI, with whom Judges O'SCANNLAIN, KLEINFELD, GOULD, TALLMAN, CALLAHAN and BEA join, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc:

Judge Bea's dissent persuasively explains why the majority opinion conflicts with Ninth Circuit precedent, and I would join it if I could. Pintos v. Pac. Creditors Ass'n, 565 F.3d 1106, 1117-18 (9th Cir. 2009) (Bea, J., dissenting). I write separately to point out another problem with the opinion: Its interpretation of the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA) is foreclosed by the plain language of the statute.

The issue is whether Pacific Creditors Association (PCA) had a permissible purpose for seeking Maria Pintos's credit report. Id. at 1110 (maj. op.). PCA argued it had one under 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(a)(3)(A), which allows a consumer reporting agency to give a report to a person it has reason to believe "intends to use the information in connection with a credit transaction involving the consumer on whom the information is to be furnished and involving the extension of credit to, or review or collection of an account of, the consumer." The majority disagreed, holding that a person isn't "involved" in a credit transaction unless he "initiates" the transaction. Pintos, 565 F.3d at 1112-13. Because Pintos didn't ask to have her car towed, she didn't initiate her debt and there was no permissible purpose. Id. at 1113.

The majority's interpretation can't be squared with 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(c). This section provides that "[a] consumer reporting agency may furnish a consumer report relating to any consumer pursuant to subparagraph (A) . . . of subsection (a)(3) [section 1681b(a)(3)(A)] of this section in connection with any credit . . . transaction that is not initiated by the consumer only if" certain conditions are met. (Emphasis added.) Section 1681b(c) restricts the permissible purpose established in section 1681b(a)(3)(A) when transactions aren't consumer-initiated. And by limiting access to reports under section 1681b(a)(3)(A) in situations where the consumer didn't initiate the transaction, section 1681b(c) clues us in on the fact that section 1681b(a)(3)(A) doesn't itself require that consumers initiate anything.

Moreover, debt collectors like PCA don't even need to meet section 1681b(c)'s special conditions. Title 15 U.S.C. § 1681a(m) defines "credit . . . transaction that is not initiated by the consumer," and it specifically excludes "the use of a consumer report by a person with which the consumer has an account . . . for purposes of . . . collecting the account" from the definition of non-consumer-initiated transactions. 15 U.S.C. § 1681a(m). And "collection of a debt is considered to be the 'collection of an account.'" Hasbun v. County of Los Angeles, 323 F.3d 801, 803 (9th Cir. 2003). Because PCA was collecting Pintos's debt, the transaction here isn't one "not initiated by the consumer" that has to meet section 1681b(c)'s conditions. Indeed, independent of the conflict with section 1681b(a)(3)(A), the majority's decision can't be reconciled with section 1681a(m): The majority holds that there was no permissible purpose because Pintos didn't initiate the transaction, but under section 1681a(m), Pintos did initiate the transaction by owing the debt.

Putting sections 1681b(a)(3)(A), 1681b(c) and 1681a(m) together, then, it's clear that: (1) Consumers can be "involved” in credit transactions under section 1681b(a)(3)(A) that they didn’t initiate; (2) section 1681b(c) provides certain restrictions on access to reports under section 1681b(a)(3)(A) when the consumer didn’t initiate the transaction; and (3) those limitations don’t apply here because section 1681a(m) says that Pintos initiated the transaction.

The majority must have read these provisions, yet still disagrees. Its mistake is plain. If subparagraph A of a statute said “all fruit shall be inspected before it can be put into a dessert,” and subparagraph B said “in the case of tomatoes inspected under subparagraph A, authorities shall perform extra special inspections,” we’d know that subparagraph A covers tomatoes. Section 1681b(c) provides special limits on access to credit reports sought under section 1681b(a)(3)(A) when transactions aren’t initiated by consumers. We therefore know that section 1681b(a)(3)(A) covers transactions not initiated by consumers. And if a statute expressly excluded golf from its definition of “fun sports,” we couldn’t hold that golf is a fun sport. Section 1681a(m) expressly excludes debt-collection transactions from its definition of non-consumer-initiated transactions. We therefore can’t say that a debt-collection transaction was non-consumer-initiated. In holding otherwise, the majority flunks Statutory Interpretation 101.

GOULD, Circuit Judge, dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc:

I also dissent from denial of rehearing en banc. With Chief Judge Kozinski, I agree with the reasoning of Judge Bea in his panel dissent. I also agree with the reasoning of the Chief Judge in his dissent from denial of rehearing en banc. I add this idea: Uniformity of treatment of creditors is useful and likely leads to lower credit enforcement costs to the benefit ultimately of consumers. I don’t see a virtue in distinguishing Hasbun and establishing different categories of creditors, some of whom can gain access to a credit report and some of whom can't. Use of credit reports expedites collections, reducing collection costs, and because such costs may be shifted to consumers, permitting the credit reports to be relied upon by creditors may decrease costs to citizens who are so unfortunate as to leave their unregistered cars parked on the street and subject to towing. If a collection agency standing in the shoes of the towing company is not allowed to request and see a credit report, then the costs of collection are going to increase, then correspondingly the costs of towing are going to increase, and finally the scope of fines for violators would likely be increased. In my view, permitting credit reports to go to creditors, whether they have a judgment or not, will be less expensive for both debtors and creditors.

OPINION

CLIFTON, Circuit Judge:

Maria E. Pintos appeals the district court's summary adjudication of her claims under the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"), 15 U.S.C. § 1681 et seq. Pintos contends that Pacific Creditors Association ("PCA") violated the FCRA by obtaining, without any FCRA-sanctioned purpose, a credit report on her from Experian Information Solutions, Inc., a credit reporting agency. Pintos also argues that Experian violated the FCRA by furnishing the report to PCA.

The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, concluding that PCA was authorized to obtain Pintos's credit report under the FCRA, which allows for the furnishing of reports "in connection with a credit transaction involving the consumer . . . and involving the . . . collection of an account of[] the consumer." 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(a)(3)(A). The district court determined that the transaction involved the collection of an account, relying upon our decision in Hasbun v. County of Los Angeles, 323 F.3d 801 (9th Cir. 2003). We conclude that Hasbun is more limited, however. Because the current case involves neither a transaction for which Pintos sought credit nor the collection of a judgment debt, we conclude that § 1681b(a)(3)(A) did not authorize PCA to obtain the credit report on Pintos. Thus, we vacate the judgment of the district court and remand for further proceedings regarding the defendants' liability. We also vacate the district court's order regarding Experian's motion to seal certain documents and remand for consideration under the proper legal standard.

I. Background

Police officers found a sport utility vehicle belonging to Pintos parked on the street in San Bruno, California, on May 29, 2002. The vehicle's registration was expired. At police direction, the vehicle was towed, and the towing company, P&S Towing, obtained a lien on the vehicle for towing and impound costs. P&S later sold the vehicle when Pintos failed to reclaim it or pay the outstanding charges. Since the vehicle's sale price did not cover the amount owed, P&S asserted a deficiency claim against Pintos and later transferred that claim to PCA, a collection agency.¹

PCA sought and obtained a credit report on Pintos from ¹California Civil Code § 3068.1(a) provides for liens "dependent upon possession for the compensation to which [a] person is legally entitled for towing, storage, or labor associated with recovery or load salvage of any vehicle subject to registration that has been authorized to be removed by a public agency." The statute also allows for lien sales with varying procedures dependant on the value of the vehicle towed and stored. See id. §§ 3068.1(b)-3068.1(c). In addition, a tow truck operator with a lien pursuant to § 3068.1 "has a deficiency claim against the registered owner of the vehicle if the vehicle is not leased or leased with a driver for an amount equal to the towing and storage charges, not to exceed 120 days of storage . . . less the amount received from the sale of the vehicle." Id. § 3068.2(a).

Experian on December 5, 2002, in connection with its effort to collect on the debt assigned by P&S. Pintos subsequently filed a complaint against PCA and Experian under the FCRA. She alleged that PCA violated the FCRA by obtaining her credit report without any FCRA-sanctioned purpose and that Experian was liable for providing the report to PCA.

PCA and Experian filed separate motions for summary judgment. Both argued that, under 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(a)(3)(A), PCA had a permissible purpose for obtaining Pintos's credit report because it was seeking to collect a debt, the towing deficiency claim. Experian further argued that it was not liable for a violation because it had fulfilled its obligations under 15 U.S.C. § 1681e, which immunizes a reporting agency against FCRA violations by the agency's subscribers so long as the agency takes certain steps.

Pintos filed a cross-motion for partial summary judgment on the issues of permissible purpose and Experian's alleged negligence. She attached to that motion several Experian documents detailing the company's internal procedures for complying with its FCRA obligations. Claiming these documents were confidential and proprietary, Experian filed a motion to seal them.

The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment on November 9, 2004. Citing Hasbun, the court agreed that § 1681b(a)(3)(A) permitted PCA to obtain Pintos's credit report. The court denied Experian's motion to seal documents, without explanation.

Pintos filed a timely notice of appeal on December 8, 2004. Experian cross-appealed the district court's denial of its motion to seal on December 9, 2004. It also sought reconsideration by the district court of the denial of that motion. On April 29, 2005, the district court held that it lacked jurisdiction over the matter since Experian already appealed the order to this court. Nevertheless, the court stated that, if it had jurisdiction, it would grant Experian's motion under Phillips ex rel. Estates of Byrd v. General Motors Corp., 307 F.3d 1206 (9th Cir. 2002), and it stayed its prior order on the subject pending the appeal.

II. Discussion

We review grants of summary judgment de novo. ACLU v. City of Las Vegas, 466 F.3d 784, 790 (9th Cir. 2006). Cross-motions for summary judgment are evaluated separately under this same standard. Id. at 790-91; Hoopa Valley Indian Tribe v. Ryan, 415 F.3d 986, 989-90 (9th Cir. 2005).

A. 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(a)(3)(A)

[1] “Congress enacted the FCRA in 1970 to promote efficiency in the Nation’s banking system and to protect consumer privacy.” TRW Inc. v. Andrews, 534 U.S. 19, 23 (2001). Those two goals lie in tension, and the FCRA strikes a balance between them. The Act authorizes credit reporting agencies to “furnish . . . consumer report[s]” because “[c]onsumer reporting agencies have assumed a vital role in assembling and evaluating consumer credit and other information on consumers.” 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681(a)(3), 1681b(a). At the same time, the FCRA “requir[es] credit reporting agencies to maintain reasonable procedures designed to assure maximum possible accuracy of the information contained in credit reports.” Andrews, 534 U.S. at 23 (citations and internal quotation marks omitted). Importantly for this case, the FCRA permits agencies to furnish credit reports only for “certain statutorily enumerated purposes.” Id.

The statutory limitation on the furnishing of credit reports is particularly relevant here, as the parties dispute whether PCA had a permissible purpose in obtaining Pintos’s credit report. Defendants contend that it did, under 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(a)(3)(A):

(a) In general

Subject to subsection (c) of this section, any consumer reporting agency may furnish a consumer report under the following circumstances and no other:

(3) To a person which it has reason to believe—

(A) intends to use the information in connection with a credit transaction involving the consumer on whom the information is to be furnished and involving the extension of credit to, or review or collection of an account of, the consumer;

[2] To qualify under § 1681b(a), the “credit transaction” must both (1) be “a credit transaction involving the consumer on whom the information is to be furnished” and (2) involve “the extension of credit to, or review or collection of an account of, the consumer.” Concluding that the transaction here involved the “collection of an account,” the district court held that the statute authorized PCA to obtain Pintos’s credit report. But the district court did not address whether the transaction was “a credit transaction involving” Pintos. That may have been because Hasbun did not separately discuss that requirement, but our court has discussed it in other cases and it is clearly set out in the statute.

One decision in which we discussed that requirement was Andrews v. TRW, Inc., 225 F.3d 1063, 1067 (9th Cir. 2000), rev’d on other grounds, TRW, Inc. v. Andrews, 534 U.S. 19 (2001), in which we addressed whether the plaintiff, a victim of identity theft, was “involved” in credit transactions initiated by an imposter posing as the plaintiff. The imposter had obtained the plaintiff's social security number and birth date and used that information to apply for credit from various companies. Id. at 1064-65. The companies in turn requested and obtained the plaintiff's credit report from TRW. Id. at 1065. The plaintiff sued TRW, claiming that it furnished her credit report "without reasonable grounds for believing that she was the consumer whom the credit applications involved." Id. (internal quotation marks omitted). The district court granted summary judgment in TRW's favor on this claim, ruling that TRW's disclosures "were made for a purpose permissible under § 1681b(a)(3)(A), because the Plaintiff, even against her will, was 'involved' in the credit transaction initiated by the Imposter." Id. at 1066.

On appeal, we concluded that the plaintiff was not "involved" in the credit transaction and reversed the summary judgment ruling. We held that the word "involve" in this context had to be read narrowly:

The district court held that the Plaintiff was involved in the transaction because her [social security] number was used. The statutory phrase is "a credit transaction involving the consumer." 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(a)(3)(A). "Involve" has two dictionary meanings that are relevant: (1) "to draw in as a participant" or (2) "to oblige to become associated." The district court understood the word in the second sense. We are reluctant to conclude that Congress meant to harness any consumer to any transaction where any crook chose to use his or her number. The first meaning of the statutory term must be preferred here. In that sense the Plaintiff was not involved.

Id. at 1067. Thus, a person is "involved" in a credit transaction for purposes of § 1681b(a)(3)(A) where she is "draw[n] in as a participant” in the transaction, but not where she is “oblige[d] to become associated” with the transaction. See id.

[3] Here, Pintos did not participate in seeking credit from the towing company. She owned the car that was towed, so she was not as completely distant from the transaction as the victim of identity theft in Andrews, but neither was she a participant in the typical transaction where an extension of credit is requested. She had no contact with P&S or PCA until P&S towed her car. She never asked to have the vehicle towed; P&S simply towed the car by direction of the police then tried to collect the charges. Pintos did not initiate the transaction that resulted in PCA requesting her credit report. As the Seventh Circuit held in Stergiopoulos v. First Midwest Bancorp, Inc., 427 F.3d 1043, 1047 (7th Cir. 2005), § 1681b(a)(3)(A) can be relied upon by the party requesting a credit report “only if the consumer initiates the transaction.”

[4] The requirement that the consumer initiate the transaction is not satisfied simply because the consumer did something that arguably led to the creditor’s claim. In Mone v. Dranow, 945 F.2d 306 (9th Cir. 1991), a credit report on Mone was obtained by his former employer, who sued Mone for unfair competition after he quit and established a competing firm. The report was obtained for the purpose of determining whether Mone had sufficient assets to pay a judgment. Id. at 308. Arguably, it was Mone’s alleged unfair competition that initiated the chain of events, but we held that the request for the report did not qualify as being “in connection with a credit transaction involving the consumer,” under § 1681b(a)(3)(A). Id.

[5] Similarly, that Pintos owned the car that was towed did not mean that she initiated the credit transaction. Like the victim in Andrews, Pintos was not a “participant” in the credit transaction, but was “oblige[d] to become associated” with it after her car was towed and the towing deficiency claim arose. See Andrews, 225 F.3d at 1067.

[6] Our decision in Hasbun did not supersede our prior decisions. The holding of that case is properly understood to be that a judgment creditor is authorized under the statute to obtain a credit report in connection with collection efforts. Hasbun, 323 F.3d 801.

In Hasbun a child support enforcement agency obtained a credit report of a father who had fallen behind in paying court-ordered child support. We made reference to the “court-ordered” nature of the debt on every page of that decision. We also did so in stating the question posed by the case (“when and how a child support enforcement agency may lawfully obtain the consumer credit report of an individual who has fallen behind in paying court-ordered child support”) and in summarizing our holding (“We affirm the district court’s grant of summary judgment in favor of defendants and hold that child support enforcement agencies need not comply with the certification requirements of 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(a)(4) when seeking to collect court-ordered child support.”). Id. at 801 (emphasis added). We explicitly adopted and quoted extensively from a Federal Trade Commission commentary which made repeated reference to the permissible purpose of a “judgment creditor” to obtain a credit report. Id. at 803 (“[a] judgment creditor has a permissible purpose to receive a consumer report on the judgment debtor for use in connection with collection of the judgment debt”) (emphasis added). To be sure, our opinion did not include that qualifier in every statement, but our holding involved a debt that had already been adjudicated. If a debt has been judicially established, there is a “credit transaction involving the consumer” no matter how it arose. The obligation is established as a matter of law, and the statute is satisfied. Hasbun extended no further. Application of Hasbun to permit a credit report to be obtained to assist the collection of a claim that had not yet been adjudicated is not supported by the logic of that decision nor by our other precedents.

[7] PCA was not a judgment creditor. Its claim against Pintos did not result from a transaction initiated by Pintos. We conclude, therefore, that § 1681b(a)(3)(A) did not authorize PCA to obtain the credit report on Pintos. Accordingly, we reverse the grant of summary judgment in defendants' favor.²

B. 15 U.S.C. § 1681e

We next consider whether Experian is also liable for any violation of the FCRA committed by PCA. The district court ²In this appeal of a summary judgment, PCA and Experian argued only that § 1681b(a)(3)(A) authorized PCA to obtain Pintos's credit report. Thus, we need not determine whether PCA had a permissible purpose under any other § 1681b subsection. On remand, Defendants may argue that PCA was authorized to obtain Pintos's report under a different subsection.

In the briefs on the merits, oral argument, petitions for rehearing, and response to petitions for rehearing, there was no argument based on 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681a(m) and 1681b(c). The parties did not appear to view those provisions to be relevant to this case. During our court's consideration of the petitions for rehearing en banc, it was suggested that these provisions, though drafted at a different time and aimed at a different situation, might shed light on the meaning of the relevant statute, § 1681b(a)(3)(A), so we requested supplemental briefs on that subject. The supplemental briefs have not persuaded us to change our opinion.

Those other provisions, §§ 1681a(m) and 1681b(c), were added in 1996 to permit lenders and insurance companies to solicit for business by purchasing lists and limited information about customers who match certain criteria (such as zip code and credit score) from credit reporting agencies. The "prescreened" customers could then be sent, for example, a "pre-approved" credit card solicitation. Pintos did not authorize the reporting agency to supply her report and the transaction did not consist of "a firm offer of credit or insurance," under § 1681b(c). Nobody contends otherwise.

At the same time, it should be clear that we do not opine on the meaning or scope of 15 U.S.C. §§ 1681a(m) and 1681b(c) or on the practice of obtaining information from credit reporting agencies to permit the extension of offers to prescreened customers, which the parties to our case agree is authorized by those statutes. A case presenting those questions is not before us.

did not reach this issue, as it determined that PCA had a permissible purpose to obtain Pintos's credit report. Experian argues that because 15 U.S.C. § 1681e immunizes it from subscribers' FCRA violations, the statute offers an alternative basis to affirm the summary judgment with respect to its liability.

A credit reporting agency may be liable for its subscriber's violation when the agency fails to comply with the statutory obligations imposed by 15 U.S.C. § 1681e. See Guimond v. Trans Union Credit Info. Co., 45 F.3d 1329, 1333 (9th Cir. 1995). Experian argues that because PCA gave it a "blanket certification" — a written promise to use Experian's credit reports only for permissible purposes — the agency satisfied its statutory obligations under § 1681e. We disagree.

[8] Section 1681e requires more from a credit reporting agency than merely obtaining a subscriber's general promise to obey the law. After prospective subscribers "certify the purposes for which [credit] information is sought, and certify that the information will be used for no other purpose," the reporting agency must make "a reasonable effort" to verify the certifications and may not furnish reports if "reasonable grounds" exist to believe that reports will be used impermissibly. 15 U.S.C. § 1681e(a). Under the plain terms of § 1681e(a), a subscriber's certification cannot absolve the reporting agency of its independent obligation to verify the certification and determine that no reasonable grounds exist for suspecting impermissible use.³ Blanket certification cannot eliminate all genuine issues of material fact with regard to Experian's liability.

³Experian suggests that Davis v. Asset Servs., 46 F. Supp. 2d 503, 508 (M.D. La. 1998), Boothe v. TRW Credit Data, 557 F. Supp. 66, 71 (S.D.N.Y. 1982), and Hiemstra v. TRW, Inc., 195 Cal. App. 3d 1629, 1634 (Cal. Ct. App. 1987) support the contention that blanket certifications will satisfy a credit reporting agency's obligations under § 1681e(a). While these cases hold that credit reporting agencies may rely on blanket certifications rather than having to verify credit requests individually, none provides that a blanket certification by itself is sufficient to satisfy the

C. Experian's Motion to File Documents Under Seal

[9] Two standards generally govern motions to seal documents like the one at issue here.⁴ First, a "compelling reasons" standard applies to most judicial records. See Kamakana v. City & County of Honolulu, 447 F.3d 1172, 1178 (9th Cir. 2006) (holding that "[a] party seeking to seal a judicial record . . . bears the burden of . . . meeting the 'compelling reasons' standard"); Foltz v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 331 F.3d 1122, 1135-36 (9th Cir. 2003). This standard derives from the common law right "to inspect and copy public records and documents, including judicial records and documents." Kamakana, 447 F.3d at 1178 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). To limit this common law right of access, a party seeking to seal judicial records must show that "compelling reasons supported by specific factual findings . . . outweigh the general history of access and the public policies favoring disclosure." Id. at 1178-79 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

§ 1681e inquiry. See, e.g., Davis, 46 F. Supp. 2d at 508 (holding that the defendant complied with the requirements of § 1681e(a) because it obtained a blanket certification and because the plaintiff did not submit "any evidence to prove that the [defendant] knew or should have had reason to know that [the subscriber] would access the report for an impermissible purpose"); Boothe, 577 F. Supp. at 71 (finding no violation where the primary business of the requesting entity used reports for a permissible purpose and there was "no showing that TRW knew of the improper purpose for the report issued"). Even if Experian did not have to verify PCA's request for Pintos's credit report individually, § 1681e(a) still required proper verification of PCA generally.

⁴A third standard covers the "narrow range of documents" such as "grand jury transcripts" and certain "warrant materials" that "traditionally [have] been kept secret for important policy reasons." Kamakana, 447 F.3d at 1178 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). No party asserts that this third standard is relevant here.

Second, a different standard applies to “private materials unearthed during discovery,” as such documents are not part of the judicial record. Id. at 1180. Rule 26(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure governs here, providing that a trial court may grant a protective order “to protect a party or person from annoyance, embarrassment, oppression, or undue burden or expense.”

The relevant standard for purposes of Rule 26(c) is whether “‘good cause’ exists to protect th[e] information from being disclosed to the public by balancing the needs for discovery against the need for confidentiality.” Phillips ex rel. Estates of Byrd v. Gen. Motors Corp., 307 F.3d 1206, 1213 (9th Cir. 2002). This “good cause” standard presents a lower burden for the party wishing to seal documents than the “compelling reasons” standard. The cognizable public interest in judicial records that underlies the “compelling reasons” standard does not exist for documents produced between private litigants. See Kamakana, 447 F.3d at 1180 (holding that “[d]ifferent interests are at stake with the right of access than with Rule 26(c)"); Foltz, 331 F.3d at 1134 (“When discovery material is filed with the court . . . its status changes.”).

The “good cause” standard is not limited to discovery. In Phillips, we held that “good cause” is also the proper standard when a party seeks access to previously sealed discovery attached to a nondispositive motion. 307 F.3d at 1213 (“when a party attaches a sealed discovery document to a nondispositive motion, the usual presumption of the public’s right of access is rebutted”). Nondispositive motions “are often ‘unrelated, or only tangentially related, to the underlying cause of action,’ and, as a result, the public’s interest in accessing dispositive materials does “not apply with equal force” to nondispositive materials. Kamakana, 447 F.3d at 1179. In light of the weaker public interest in nondispositive materials, we apply the “good cause” standard when parties wish to keep them under seal. Applying the “compelling interest” standard under these circumstances would needlessly “undermine a district court's power to fashion effective protective orders." Foltz, 331 F.3d at 1135.

[10] Experian wishes to seal documents attached to Pintos's cross-motion for summary judgment. Rule 26(c) does not govern these documents because they are not "private materials unearthed during discovery" but have become part of the judicial record. Kamakana, 447 F.3d at 1180. Additionally, the documents do not fall within the Phillips exception to the general presumption of access because Pintos's motion was dispositive.⁵ See Foltz, 331 F.3d at 1135 (holding that the Phillips exception is "expressly limited to the status of materials . . . attached to a non-dispositive motion") (emphasis in original). Consequently, Experian must overcome a strong presumption of access by showing that "compelling reasons supported by specific factual findings . . . outweigh the general history of access and the public policies favoring disclosure." Kamakana, 447 F.3d at 1178-79 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

[11] Under the "compelling reasons" standard, a district court must weigh "relevant factors,"⁶ base its decision "on a compelling reason," and "articulate the factual basis for its ruling, without relying on hypothesis or conjecture."

⁵This case differs slightly from Phillips, in which a nonparty sought access to court records previously filed under seal. Phillips, 307 F.3d at 1209. Here no third party seeks access to previously sealed documents, but this is a distinction without a difference. It is undisputed that a "strong presumption of access to judicial records applies fully to dispositive pleadings." Kamakana, 447 F.3d at 1179. Accordingly, whether a third party has sought access is immaterial when a party moves to seal documents already filed with the court. See id. at 1179 (holding simply that "'compelling reasons' must be shown to seal judicial records attached to a dispositive motion").

Hagestad v. Tragesser, 49 F.3d 1430, 1434 (9th Cir. 1995). A proper analysis is reviewed for abuse of discretion. Foltz, 331 F.3d at 1135. An order that fails to articulate its reasoning must be vacated and remanded because “meaningful appellate review is impossible” when the appellate panel has no way of knowing “whether relevant factors were considered and given appropriate weight.” Hagestad, 49 F.3d at 1434-35 (internal quotation marks omitted).

[12] The district court’s November 9, 2004, denial of Experian’s motion to seal offered no explanation for the decision. The explanation provided in the court’s April 29, 2005, order denying Experian’s motion to alter or amend judgment did not fill the gap. With the case already on appeal, the district court denied Experian’s motion on jurisdictional grounds but suggested that it would grant Experian’s motion if it still had jurisdiction, staying its prior order to file the documents in the public record pending our resolution of the appeal. According to the district court, Phillips would govern the motion and good cause existed for placing Experian’s documents under seal.

[13] Because the documents at issue here were attached to a dispositive motion, however, Phillips does not provide the proper standard. A determination by the district court that good cause exists for sealing Experian’s documents does not establish that there are “compelling reasons” to do so. See Kamakana, 447 F.3d at 1180 (holding that “a ‘good cause’ showing . . . will not suffice to fulfill the ‘compelling reasons’ standard that a party must meet to rebut the presumption of access to dispositive pleadings and attachments”). Instead, the court must decide whether compelling reasons exist to seal the documents. Foltz, 331 F.3d at 1135-36. We vacate and remand “for the making of findings in support of an[] order on this issue,” Hagestad, 49 F.3d at 1435, in light of the proper legal standard.

III. Conclusion

We reverse the district court's summary judgment in favor of defendants and remand for further proceedings. Additionally, we vacate the district court's order denying Experian's motion to seal documents and remand for consideration in light of the proper legal standard.

REVERSED AND REMANDED; JUDGMENT VACATED.

BEA, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

The majority concludes that because this case involves neither a transaction for which Pintos sought a loan nor the collection of a judgment debt, 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(a)(3)(A) did not authorize the Pacific Creditors Association (“PCA”) to obtain Maria Pintos’s credit report or Experian Information Solutions, Inc. (“Experian”) to release it. Because I disagree with the majority’s conclusion that Pintos’s decision to leave her unregistered car on a public street where she knew it might be towed did not “involve” her in a credit transaction, I respectfully dissent.

Title 15, Section 1681b(a)(3)(A) of the United States Code permits a credit reporting agency to furnish a consumer’s credit report to a person it has reason to believe “intends to use the information in connection with a credit transaction involving the consumer . . . and involving the extension of credit to, or review or collection of an account of, the consumer.” Relying on Andrews v. TRW, Inc., 225 F.3d 1063, 1067 (9th Cir. 2000), the majority concludes that because Pintos did not ask for her car to be towed, ante at 7286, she was not “involved” in the transaction.

This case bears little resemblance to Andrews. In Andrews, the plaintiff was a victim of identity theft—she was passive and guiltless, not even negligent. Pintos, by contrast, was no innocent bystander in the chain of events that resulted in her debt to P&S Towing (“P&S”). Pintos chose—for two consecutive years—not to pay the automobile registration fees required by California law. Pintos chose instead to break the law by driving her car on expired tags. See Cal. Veh. Code § 4000(a)(1) (“No person shall drive, move, or leave standing upon a highway . . . any motor vehicle . . . unless it is registered and the appropriate fees have been paid. . . .”); see also id. § 42001.8 (making it an infraction to violate § 4000). Pintos chose to leave her car on a public street, subjecting it to towing. See id. § 22651(o)(1)(A) (permitting law enforcement to tow a car whose registration is six months overdue). And Pintos chose not to pay the fees assessed by P&S or retrieve her car in a timely manner, resulting in the lien sale and deficiency claim. See Cal. Civil Code §§ 3068.1, 3068.2 (providing that a towing company has a lien dependent upon possession and a deficiency claim for unpaid towing charges). With all respect both to Pintos and the majority, refusing to pay required vehicle registration fees and parking one's car on a public street is asking to have one's car towed.

The majority rightly observes that the fact Pintos's actions resulted in P&S's claim is, alone, insufficient to justify P&S requesting her credit report. In Mone v. Dranow, 945 F.2d 306 (9th Cir. 1991), Dranow, Mone's former employer, concluded Mone was engaged in unfair competition by running a rival business, and obtained Mone's credit report in order to determine whether suing Mone might be worthwhile. We held that Dranow did not intend to use the credit report "in connection with a credit transaction involving" Mone. Id. at 308 (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 1681b(3)(A) (1982)).

But P&S's relationship to Pintos is more than that of mere prospective litigation adversary; P&S is a creditor entitled to access Pintos's credit report in order to collect the debt. See Hasbun v. County of Los Angeles, 323 F.3d 801, 803 (9th Cir. 2003) ("[T]he limited case law addressing this issue has uniformly held that creditors have a permissible purpose in receiving a consumer report to assist them in collecting a debt.").

The moment P&S towed Pintos's car, P&S became Pintos's creditor; Pintos owed P&S a definite, legally recognized debt for the services P&S rendered—loaned—to Pintos until Pintos paid for those services. Under the California Civil Code, when P&S towed Pintos's car at the direction of the San Bruno Police Department, P&S obtained "a lien dependent upon possession for the compensation to which [P&S] is legally entitled for towing, storage, or labor associated with the recovery or load salvage” of Pintos’s vehicle. See Cal. Civil. Code § 3068.1. This code section entitled P&S to sell Pintos’s car to recover its fees without seeking judicial approval or intervention; the code certainly does not require P&S to obtain a judgment. And any tow-truck operator who has such a lien “has a deficiency claim against the registered owner of the vehicle.” Id. § 3068.2 (emphasis added). A deficiency claim is a debt. That Pintos’s debt was created by operation of law rather than contract is of no moment.

The majority concludes Hasbun is inapplicable because that case involved a judgment debt. See 323 F.3d at 803-04. But Hasbun is not so limited.¹ Hasbun concerned child support payments and the only way a person becomes obligated to make such payments is through a judicial decree. It does not follow that judicial adjudication is the only way an individual may become obligated as a debtor. The cited California Civil Code sections automatically make the owner of a towed vehicle liable for towing charges and automatically create a lien and a deficiency claim in favor of the towing company. The towing company has no need to reduce its lien to a court judgment to establish Pintos’s obligation to pay. There is a creditor-debtor relationship established by the operation of the lien law regardless whether an action to collect the deficiency is commenced. P&S Towing is thus much more like the judgment creditor in Hasbun than the prospective litigation claimant in Mone.

¹Indeed, Hasbun concluded that judgment creditors have a permissible purpose in obtaining a credit report because such a creditor “‘is in the same position as any creditor attempting to collect a debt from a consumer.’” Id. at 803 (emphasis added) (quoting 16 C.F.R. § 600, App. at 509 (2002)). The principle that a creditor may access a debtor’s credit report in order to collect upon a delinquent account is recognized by both the Federal Trade Commission, 16 C.F.R. Pt. 600, App. at 59, and by the Sixth Circuit, see Duncan v. Handmaker, 149 F.3d 424, 427-28 (6th Cir. 1998).

For these reasons, I would affirm the decision of the district court. I concur, however, in part C of the majority opinion.
