

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

RICHARD M. GILMAN, et al.,

NO. CIV. S-05-830 LKK/GGH

Plaintiffs,

v.

O R D E R

EDMUND G. BROWN, JR., et al.,

Defendants.

_____ /

In California persons convicted of murder but with a sentence less than mandatory life, are at some point, eligible for parole. See California Penal Code §3041, In re Lawrence, 44 Cal 4th 1181 (2008). Plaintiffs in this class action are such prisoners who allege constitutional violations related to California's parole system. Pending before the court is defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, ECF No. 404. For the reasons stated herein, defendants' motion is GRANTED with respect to claims 2, 4, 5, and 7, and is DENIED as to the remaining claims.

////

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26

I. Background

The factual and procedural background of this case have been detailed at length in prior orders. See, e.g., March 4, 2009 Order Granting Class Certification, ECF No. 182. What follows is a summary of the background relevant to this motion.

Plaintiffs' complaint alleges nine causes of action challenging California's parole process on ex post facto and due process grounds. Those causes of action can be grouped as follows: Claims 1 and 3-7 allege due process violations with respect to parole suitability determinations; Claim 8 alleges an ex post facto violation with respect to the deferral provisions of California's Proposition 9; and Claim 9 alleges an ex post facto violation with respect to the Governor's authority to reverse a parole grant, enacted by Proposition 89. The parties agree that Claim 2 is redundant of Claims 8 and 9, and should be dismissed.

This court has certified a class and subclasses. The class is defined as all California state prisoners who a) have been sentenced to a life term with possibility of parole, b) have reached parole eligibility, and c) have been denied parole at least once. The subclasses are: 1) As to Claim 8 (ex post facto challenge to Proposition 9 deferral provisions), the class is defined as "all California state prisoners who have been sentenced to a life term with possibility of parole for an offense that occurred before November 4, 2008." 2) As to Claim 9 (ex post facto challenge to Proposition 89 giving Governor authority to overturn a parole decision), the class

1 is defined as "all California state prisoners who have been
2 sentenced to a life term with possibility of parole for an
3 offense that occurred before November 8, 1988." April 21, 2011
4 Order, ECF No. 339.

5 Defendants now seek a judgment on the pleadings on all claims.

6 II. Standard for a Judgment on the Pleadings

7 A motion for judgment on the pleadings may be brought 8 "[a]fter the pleadings are closed but within such time as to not 9 delay the trial." Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c). All allegations of fact by 10 the party opposing a motion for judgment on the pleadings are 11 accepted as true. Doleman v. Meiji Mut. Life Ins. Co., 727 F.2d 12 1480, 1482 (9th Cir. 1984). A "dismissal on the pleadings for 13 failure to state a claim is proper only if 'the movant clearly 14 establishes that no material issue of fact remains to be 15 resolved and that he is entitled to judgment as a matter of 16 law." ' Id. (quoting 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice
17 and Procedure: Civil § 1368, at 690 (1969)); see also McGlinchy
18 v. Shell Chemical Co., 845 F.2d 802, 810 (9th Cir.1988).

19 When a Rule 12(c) motion is used to raise the defense of 20 failure to state a claim, the motion is subject to the same test
21 as a motion under Rule 12(b)(6). McGlinchy, 845 F.2d at 810;
22 Aldabe v. Aldabe, 616 F.2d 1089, 1093 (9th Cir. 1989). Thus, the 23 complaint must be supported by factual allegations. Ashcroft v.
24 Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, ___, 129 S. Ct. 1937 (2009). Moreover,
25 this court "must accept as true all of the factual allegations
26 contained in the complaint." Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89,

1 94 (2007).

2 III. Analysis

3 A. Due Process Clause Claims

4 Plaintiffs' due process clause claims (Claims 1, 3-7) allege
5 various constitutional defects in California's parole eligibility
6 determination process. Generally, plaintiffs allege that the Board
7 of Parole Hearings ("the Board") and the Governor are denying and 8 deferring parole for improper reasons. Defendants argue that the 9 Supreme Court's holdings in Greenholtz v. Inmates of the Nebraska
10 Penal and Correction Complex, 442 U.S. 1 (1979) and Swarthout v.
11 Cooke, 131 S. Ct. 859 (2011) render the due process claims
12 uncognizable.

13
14 Greenholtz was a Section 1983 case challenging Nebraska's 15 procedure for making parole eligibility determinations. There is 16 no federal constitutional right to be released on parole prior to 17 the end of a valid sentence. Greenholtz, 442 U.S. at 7. However, 18 once a state establishes a parole system, that system may create 19 a court enforceable expectation of parole. In Greenholtz, the 20 Supreme Court "accepted" that Nebraska's statutory scheme created 21 an expectancy of release on parole, and that the expectancy "is 22 entitled to some measure of constitutional protection." The Court 23 emphasized that "whether any other state statute [governing parole 24 eligibility] provides a protectable entitlement must be decided on 25 a case-by-case basis." Id. at 12. The Court found that in the 26 context of Nebraska's parole eligibility determination procedure

1 due process is satisfied where the procedure "affords an 2 opportunity to be heard, and when parole is denied it informs the 3 inmate in what respects he falls short of qualifying for parole."
4 Id. at 16. Although the Court's holding was specific to Nebraska's 5 statutory scheme, the Court noted that "the function of legal 6 process, as that concept is embodied in the Constitution, and in 7 the realm of factfinding, is to minimize the risk of erroneous
8 decisions." Id. at 11. Thus, a procedure which does not decrease
9 the risk of error does not raise due process concerns. In any 10 event, defendants do not deny that California's system creates some 11 form of liberty interest.

12 In Swarthout, two California prisoners petitioned for federal 13 habeas relief after being denied parole by the Board and Governor, 14 respectively. Both had sought, and were denied, habeas relief in 15 state court. The state court had determined that the parole denials 16 had been based on "some evidence," of current dangerousness as is 17 required by state law. The Ninth Circuit, applying the AEDPA
18 standard to petitioner Cooke's claim, found that the state court's 19 conclusion was "based on an unreasonable determination of the facts 20 in light of the evidence," and that therefore Cooke was entitled 21 to habeas relief. Cooke v. Solis, 606 F.3d 1206, 1216 (9th Cir.
22 2010). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that "the beginning and 23 the end of the federal habeas courts' inquiry into whether Cooke 24 and Clay received due process" should have been a review of the 25 application of constitutionally required procedures. Swarthout at 26 *7. The Court held that due process was satisfied because the

1 petitioners "were allowed to speak at their parole hearings and to 2 contest the evidence against them, were afforded access to their
3 records in advance, and were notified as to the reasons why parole
4 was denied." The Court noted that this process was "at least" the 5 amount of process due, citing Greenholtz's holding that "the 6 Constitution does not require more" than an opportunity to be heard
7 and a statement of the reasons why parole was denied in the context
8 of a parole statute similar to California's. Swarthout at *7.

9 Plaintiffs here allege that California's procedure for 10 determining parole eligibility falls short of constitutional
11 requirements because the Board and the Governor's decisions are 12 guided by "biases," such as a belief that a prisoner must serve an 13 arbitrary number of years before he can be considered eligible for 14 parole (First and Third Causes of Action); the Board and Governor 15 rely on static factors to support the denial of parole, despite 16 lack of risk to public safety (Fourth Cause of Action); the reasons
17 given to defer or deny parole are not connected to risk to public
18 safety and do not provide meaningful guidance to the prisoner about 19 what he must do to obtain parole (Fifth Cause of Action); the Board
20 and Governor make their decisions based on biases, but justify them
21 by the use of regulatory criteria, or base their decisions on 22 limited items of evidence in the record that are inconsistent with 23 the record as a whole (Sixth Cause of Action); the Board and 24 Governor defer parole reconsideration for some plaintiffs for more
25 than one year for unreasonable reasons (Seventh Cause of Action).
26 Thus, plaintiffs argue that, although the California parole

1 statutes do provide for the basic due process safeguards (a hearing
2 and a statement of the reason for denial), the hearings themselves
3 are tainted by the biases of the Board and the Governor, rendering
4 them constitutionally inadequate.

5       The Supreme Court has spoken unequivocally on the division of 6 labor between the state and federal courts with respect to 7 challenges to parole eligibility determinations for state
8 prisoners. Pursuant to Swarthout, the federal courts may not review
9 a state's parole eligibility decision on the merits. This is 10 because the question of whether those decisions comply with state 11 law is a question for the state's courts and outside the 12 jurisdiction of the federal courts. The federal courts' role is 13 to determine whether those prisoners have received the process they 14 are due under the constitution, i.e. a hearing and a statement of 15 reasons for the denial of parole. As is explained below, it appears
16 to this court that the Court's ruling, while quite confining, does 17 not end the inquiry in this case.

18       Although not discussed in Greenholtz or Swarthout, the Supreme 19 Court has held elsewhere that a constitutional hearing is a
20 "meaningful" hearing. "For more than a century the central meaning 21 of procedural due process has been clear: Parties whose rights are 22 to be affected are entitled to be heard; and in order that they may 23 enjoy that right they must first be notified. It is equally
24 fundamental that the right to notice and an opportunity to be heard
25 must be granted at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner."
26 Fuentes v. Shevin, 407 U.S. 67, 80 (1972)(internal quotations

1 omitted)(emphasis added). For example, a parole eligibility
2 determination presided over by Board members who were all wearing
3 earplugs would not be a "meaningful" hearing. Similarly, it appears
4 to this court that the statement of reasons for a denial of parole
5 must be a statement of the real reasons for denial.

6 Defendants apparently concede that a parole board hearing
7 would not satisfy due process if it were presided over by officers
8 with an unconstitutional bias. Defs.' Mot. 10. Indeed, in the 9 context of administrative adjudication as well as in the courts,
10 "a biased decisionmaker [is] constitutionally unacceptable."
11 Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35, 47 (1975). "That officers acting 12 in a judicial or quasi-judicial capacity are disqualified by their 13 interest in the controversy to be decided is, of course, the 14 general rule." Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 522 (1927). A 15 governor's role when reviewing parole decisions, is "functionally
16 comparable" to a judge's role. Miller v. Davis, 521 F.3d 1142, 1144
17 (9th Cir. 2008). Similarly, parole board officials' decisions to 18 grant, deny, or revoke parole is "functionally comparable" to tasks
19 performed by judges. Swift v. California, 384 F.3d 1184, 1189 (9th 20 Cir. 2004). Thus, in order to be constitutionally sufficient, a 21 parole eligibility hearing must be presided over by unbiased
22 officials. Similarly, the Governor, when reviewing parole
23 decisions, must make the decisions without improper bias. The 24 question then, is what types of bias in parole eligibility
25 decisionmakers will render a parole eligibility hearing inadequate.

26 No one could dispute that a decision made by a Board tainted

1 by a bribe would not satisfy due process even though the Board went
2 through the motions of holding a hearing and stating a permissible
3 reason for denial of parole. "Various situations have been 4 identified in which experience teaches that the probability of 5 actual bias on the part of the judge or decisionmaker is too high 6 to be constitutionally tolerable. Among these cases are those in 7 which the adjudicator has a pecuniary interest in the outcome and 8 in which he has been the target of personal abuse or criticism from 9 the party before him. Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35, 47 (1975).
10 A self-interest in the outcome of a quasi-judicial decision, then,
11 is one type of bias that could render a hearing inadequate.

12 In many contexts, those presiding over the hearing must not 13 only be free from self-interest, but they must also be "detached."
14 In the parole revocation context, the Supreme Court mandates a 15 "neutral and detached" hearing body. Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S.
16 471 (1972).<sup>1</sup> The court concludes that in the parole eligibility
17 determination context, a hearing must be conducted by a neutral, 18 detached body, free from pecuniary or other self-interest in the 19 outcome. A neutral decision maker is one who arrives at a hearing
20 with an open mind, who considers the evidence and arguments
21 presented at the hearing, and whose decision is influenced by what 22 transpires at the hearing.

23 Thus, plaintiffs could ultimately prevail on their due process

---

24
25 <sup>1</sup> See also Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, 533 (2004) (among 26 the process due to citizen detainees seeking to challenge their classification as enemy combatants is a hearing "before a neutral decision-maker").

1 claims upon a showing that the Board and the Governor were not
2 "neutral decision-makers" while making parole eligibility
3 decisions. Plaintiffs have alleged as much in their complaint by 4 asserting, in essence, that the Board and Governor had a
5 predetermined judgment about whether parole should be granted or 6 denied based on factors that are not a part of the hearing. If it
7 is the case that the Board and Governor had an across-the-board
8 practice of denying parole until a minimum number of years was 9 served, with no consideration given to the substance of the 10 hearing, then the plaintiffs are arguably deprived of a meaningful 11 hearing, and consequently, of their constitutional right to due 12 process.<sup>2</sup>

13 Similarly, plaintiffs allege defects with respect to the due
14 process requirement of a statement of reasons for parole denial.
15 Plaintiffs allege that the Board and Governor make their decisions 16 based on biases, but justify them by the use of regulatory 17 criteria. This allegation challenges the procedure, and not the 18 substance of the Board's and Governor's decision, and is thus 19 within the scope of this court's authority.

20 Accordingly, defendants motion for judgment on the pleadings
21 of plaintiffs' due process claims is DENIED with respect to Claims 22 1, 3, and 6. The motion is GRANTED with respect to Claims 4, 5, and 23 7, which challenge the substance of the parole eligibility
24

---

25 <sup>2</sup> Of course given the nature of the motion, the court makes 26 no judgement of whether there is proof of a lack of a hearing conforming to the requisites of due process.

1 decisions.

2 B. Statute of Limitations

3 Defendants assert that the claims of the named plaintiffs and 4 certain class members are barred by the statute of limitations.
5 Specifically, defendants contend that all of plaintiffs' Due
6 Process claims (Claims 1, 3-7) are untimely because the plaintiffs 7 knew or should have known of the allegedly unlawful practice when 8 they were denied parole any time after 1990, the year in which 9 plaintiffs allege the improper procedures began. Defs.' Mot. 15.
10 Defendants also argue that the Ninth Cause of Action, an Ex Post 11 Facto Claim, is time barred for any class member whose parole was 12 denied prior to October 7, 2006.

13 Section 1983 does not contain a statute of limitations, but 14 courts apply the state statute of limitations for personal injury
15 claims. Wilson v. Garcia, 471 U.S. 261, 279 (1985); McDougal v.
16 County of Imperial, 942 F.2d 668, 672 (9th Cir. 1991). Prior to 17 January 1, 2003, the statute of limitations that applies to § 1983
18 claims was one year, as then delineated in Cal. Civ. Proc. Code §
19 340(3). Id. The California legislature amended the statute of 20 limitations for personal injury claims to two years, beginning
21 January 1, 2003. See Cal. Civ. Proc. Code § 335.1.

22 In a § 1983 action, "a claim accrues when the plaintiff knows 23 or has reason to know of the injury which is the basis of the 24 action." Knox v. Davis, 260 F.3d 1009, 1013 (9th Cir. 2001).
25 Defendants contend that each plaintiffs' claim accrued the first 26

1 time they were denied parole pursuant to the allegedly unlawful
2 practices. Plaintiffs contend that they may pursue their claims
3 because the conditions complained of are a continuing violation.
4 "A continuing violation is occasioned by continual unlawful acts,
5 not by continual ill effects from an original violation." Ward v.
6 Caulk, 650 F.2d 1144, 1147 (9th Cir. 1981); Ledbetter v. Goodyear, 7 550 U.S. 618 (superceded by statute on other grounds). That is to 8 say, even if "some or all the events evidencing the inception of 9 [an unconstitutional] practice or policy occurred prior to the 10 limitations period" the claim is not barred. De Grassi v. City of 11 Glendora, 207 F3d. 636, 644 (9th Cir. 2000). While plaintiffs may 12 not use a continuing violations theory to avoid the statute of 13 limitations when only the lingering effect of a prior act remains, 14 "Section 1983 is presumptively available to remedy a state's 15 ongoing violation of federal law. A plaintiff has adequately pled
16 an ongoing claim if she can show a systematic policy or practice
17 that operated, in part, within the limitations period -- a
18 systematic violation." Mansourian v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 19 594 F.3d 1095, 1110 (9th Cir. 2010)(internal quotations and 20 citations omitted). Here, of course, plaintiffs allege that the 21 defendants have an ongoing policy of depriving inmates of their due
22 process during the parole eligibility determination process.

23 Defendants cite Brown v. Georgia Bd. of Pardons & Paroles, 335
24 F.3d 1259, 1261 (11th Cir. 2003), which rejected a continuing
25 violations theory asserted by an inmate who was first denied parole 26 outside of the statute of limitations period, holding "that

1 plaintiff's injury occurred when the Georgia Parole Board first 2 applied its new policy to him in 1995, which was also when 3 plaintiff could have discovered the factual predicate of his 4 claim." This court must respectfully disagree with defendants
5 contention. Even if plaintiffs were able to discover the factual
6 predicate of their claims the first time they were denied parole, 7 they are not necessarily barred. In the Ninth Circuit, use of the 8 continuing violations doctrine has never been invalidated in the 9 context of an unconstitutional policy or procedure. Moreover, as 10 plaintiffs note, the Brown plaintiff was seeking to remedy a prior 11 improper denial of parole, whereas the plaintiffs here seek only 12 prospective relief.

13 IV. Conclusion

14 For the foregoing reasons, the court ORDERS as follows:

15 [1] Defendants' Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings, 16 is GRANTED with respect to Claims 2, 4, 5, and 7 and 17

18 The motion is DENIED with respect to all other claims.

19 IT IS SO ORDERED.

20 DATED: May 30, 2012.

21
22
23
24 LAWRENCE K. KARLTON
25 SENIOR JUDGE
26 UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT