REPLY DECLARATION OF GARY E. MASON

To whom it may concern:

My objection to the false Settlement.

The proposed Settlement is not fair or reasonable.

Buzz's launch did not violate the privacy of their subscribers; it's not true to fact.

Google has always been committed to offering users transparency and choice in Buzz and all their products, and continue to work together with users to provide the best experience possible.

Immediately following the Buzz launch in February of this year, Google moved quickly to make significant product improvements including increased visibility, an updated start up process featuring auto-suggestions, and adding Buzz to the Google Dashboard. In April, Google rolled out a "second chance" encouraging Buzz users to check and verify their privacy settings.

Google created an $8.5 million fund, the majority of which will go to organizations focused on Internet privacy education and policy, and made additional efforts to educate users about the privacy aspects of Buzz.
