A Year in the Life of a Yopo<sup>8</sup>

On April 21, 2005, I got a seemingly ignorable email via LinkedIn.com:

Hi Karel,
I'm VP and GM at Thefacebook, the top site for college students in the US. [...] Given your experience at LookSmart, I thought you might be a good fit. Thefacebook is still a very small team despite having a strong market position, so this is a great opportunity for the right person. If you're interested in talking with us please let me know the best way to get in touch with you.
Thanks,
Matt

Thus started a yearlong dreamlike odyssey, from which I have just awoken.

A few quick weeks later I was one of the first ten engineers, papers signed on May 5, 2005. I may have been engineer number seven or nine, depending on how many informal contributions we acknowledge. Nevertheless, preceding me clearly are only Zuck himself, Dustin the Man, D'Angelo the Brain, Victor, James, Aaron, and McCollum. To bring experience to a code base of which every line had been written by someone younger than twenty, two other senior engineers, Steve Chen and Scott, were hired with me. Scott has a Master's
