Samsung's "proffer" does not set forth the evidence it intends to introduce, other than as "Mr. Nishibori's testimony and the documentary evidence, such as the Sony-style CAD files and emails." Absent a proper proffer, Samsung's renewed motion for reconsideration should be rejected.

Samsung instead argues theories for the admissibility of this evidence that have already been rejected. First, Samsung argues the evidence is relevant to show "the design elements" in Apple's phones "were known to other designers in the field," or that the intellectual property Samsung is accused of infringing was not "proprietary and unique to" Apple. This is an obviousness theory, which Judge Grewal has stricken.

Second, Samsung argues that this evidence "corroborate[s] Samsung's independent creation story," "rebut[s] an allegation of copying," and "rebut[s] Apple's allegation of willfulness." This is three ways of arguing the same point, and it is a logical impossibility. Evidence of how Apple came up with its iPhone designs (which is what Samsung claims this evidence shows) is not probative of how Samsung came up with its designs for the accused products. Because the evidence relating to Mr. Nishibori's work is not relevant for this purpose and is, under Judge Grewal's order, not relevant to prove invalidity, Apple has moved to exclude it as irrelevant and inadmissible under Rule 403.

Should the Court decide to admit any evidence relating to Sony-style design and its purported influence on Apple's development of the iPhone, Apple respectfully requests that the Court include the following limiting instruction: "You have heard evidence [or "statements from counsel"] that during the development of the iPhone an Apple designer expressed the opinion that a 'Sony-style' design had certain advantages. I am instructing you that you may not consider this as evidence that Apple's designs for the iPhone were not new and original, or that they came from outside of Apple."
