Facebook Infringes My Patents Too, Says CEO Who Just Sued Google

Rockstar — the closely watched consortium that sued Google, Samsung, and six other handset makers on Thursday — says that another big-name company is infringing its vast patent portfolio: Facebook.

Rockstar CEO John Veschi doesn't want to get into the details, but he believes his company's 4,000-patents — which it inherited after Apple, Microsoft, Blackberry, Sony, and Ericsson purchased the majority of patents owned by the imploded Canadian telecom giant, Nortel — cover, or “read on,” the kind of social network operated by Facebook.

“I'm definitely aware of many that ‘read on’ features that are in any social network, whether it's Facebook LinkedIn or any other thing like that,” he says. Though he declined to say more, Veschi has said in the past that his patent portfolio is so great that it's hard to imagine any high-tech companies that don't use techniques covered by the Nortel patents.

Rockstar had been negotiating with technology companies for more than a year and a half, trying to get outfits such as Google to license its portfolio of more than 4,000 patents, which cover a wide range of areas. The company has been trying to cut intellectual property licensing deals across six broad sectors — including social media. And while Rockstar has sealed a “fairly small number” of deals to date, it's been a difficult business.

After surviving the Nortel meltdown, Rockstar CEO John Veschi now controls 4,000 patents related to mobile devices and computer networks. Photo: Dan Krauss/WIRED

That's what's forcing the lawsuits, the first of which were filed on Thursday in federal court in Texas. "We've gotten to a point with many of them where they even say to us: 'Look, you need to sue us. I can't really get the attention of management because we have other people who have sued us. And if you don't sue us, you haven't basically put the table stakes down to get to the big table.'"

Veschi says that, although Rockstar sued Google (over search technology patents) and seven of Google's Android partners on Thursday, that it is incorrect to see Rockstar as a proxy agent for Apple, Microsoft, and Blackberry — all of whom are part-owners of Rockstar with seats on its board of directors. "It was basically all my decision-making," he says. "I think it's important for people to realize that my shareholders had nothing to do with this."

Veschi, like many of Rockstar's employees is an ex-Nortel worker. He was hired by the telecommunications giant in 2008 to find patent licensing revenue — something Nortel hadn't ever done effectively. He says that Nortel that the search and mobile phone lawsuits that were filed yesterday can be traced back to the first work he did at Nortel five years ago. "Mobile and the internet search are in some ways the most ripe because they were actually the two franchises I built first when I joined Nortel in 2008."

Rockstar revealed yesterday that it has set up subsidiaries to manage its patent licensing activities in mobile and search. The company is also dividing up its patents to include licensing for telecommunication services providers, networking equipment, enterprise technology and social networking, Veschi says.

From Veschi's perspective, Rockstar is simply seeking the revenue that Nortel had coming to it for its pioneering work in telecommunications. Not surprisingly, the Electronic Frontier Foundation, which has long fought against such patent suits, sees things differently. "The marketplace is where this entire fight should be taking place," says Julie Samuels, senior staff attorney with the EFF.

“Nortel made its money off its products. Now people are trying to squeeze water form the rock that was Nortel. In any rational economic system there would be no there there, but because of our messed-up patent system, they’re able to do that.”

The original point of patents is to encourage companies to do more, they are increasingly being used as a weapon to harm the industry and make some money in the process. It's past time the system was reviewed.

They do not harm the industry ! If you invent something let's use Tesla for example what did he come up with ? Then got screwed died alone in a hotel room and who got the credit ? Cash makes the world go round and in a land were you can sue for a ham sandwich who is at fault now the patent office or the courts.

Tesla's situation does not describe the patent environment in the 21st century. That was around 100 years ago.

We're not talking major breakthroughs here. The bulk of these patents are so small and insignificant yet somehow gets patented, it inhibits everyone. Slide to unlock is not a breakthrough, it's not inventive, and it should never have gotten patented. I'm sure 99.9% of these patents are of the same nature.

"to encourage companies to do more"

Well sure, but do what? Today, most pro-patent people have given up or downplay the argument that patents are needed to incentivize invention (excepting perhaps pharmaceuticals). The much stronger argument is that patents play an important role in getting the inventor to disclose what they've done - discouraging trade secrets and black boxes.

In my opinion, the biggest problem with Myriad, the case that holds you can't patent genes, is that genetic medicine companies are simply not going to tell you what genes they've identified as predictive of disease. Before Myriad, if you were a genetics lab, you could say to the world - hey, this chunk of DNA indicates a propensity for breast cancer, without worrying that every university lab in the country would start testing destroying any

About Rockstar

Rockstar is a patent licensing business that owns and manages a portfolio of more than 4,000 patents developed by technology pioneer Nortel Networks. This portfolio consists of patents covering a wide range of consumer and enterprise communications technologies currently in use or in development in markets worldwide.

Through patent licensing and sales, Rockstar brings these innovations to businesses around the globe.

Facts about Rockstar's portfolio

The bulk of the Nortel Networks patent portfolio was transitioned to Rockstar as part of Nortel's bankruptcy process in 2011. This transaction yielded an historic $4.5B for Nortel's creditors, and established an initial set of founding licensees to the Rockstar portfolio. Because Rockstar's portfolio is based on a wide range of telecommunications, wired and networking based research and development performed by Nortel engineers, a significant portion of today's high technology products and services relate to these patents.

Let innovation thrive

Rockstar is deeply committed to advancing innovation worldwide through its patent licensing program. Intellectual property is a strategic asset. Acquisition of such an asset from Rockstar through a license or purchase can provide significant strategic value to our partners and customers. Our licensees gain access to the immense power and know-how of the patented technologies in Rockstar's portfolio, in addition to gaining freedom of design, improving time-to-market product development and delivering better end-customer satisfaction.

Protect when necessary

Licensing is always the preferred route at Rockstar. However, with a portfolio that is widely regarded by peers and analysts as one of the most significant, high-quality collections in the technology industry today, Rockstar is committed to protecting its intellectual property where necessary.

When patent infringement occurs

Today, a vast number of companies in the marketplace are using technology products or processes built directly from patents in Rockstar's portfolio. When patent infringement occurs, there is typically one of two consequences: either the infringing businesses obtain the legal right to use that technology via a patent license, or the parties pursue the case through litigation—a step that can be costly and time consuming for both parties.

How evidence of patent infringement is collected

While Rockstar prefers to help innovation in the marketplace grow through the licensing route, we also aggressively pursue those who refuse to respect and compensate patent holders. Evidence of patent infringement is collected and analyzed by Rockstar at our in-house labs. Rockstar engineers—many of whom are patent holders themselves—conduct extensive reverse engineering on products that are suspected of patent infringement. When evidence of use is established, a claim report is created and an infringing company is contacted to discuss next steps.
