

EXHIBIT 2

White Civil Rights : The Website for Europeans and Americans Wherever They May Live

November 24, 2010

TSA Abuses: Is Flying a Right or a Privilege?

Filed under:

- Civil Rights

— @ 11:15 am

by James Buchanan

A lot of government lackeys and apologists have rushed forward to defend the new highly intrusive TSA procedures. One of their excuses is that “you don’t have to fly”.

Americans have been able to fly on commercial airliners since the 1920s. Taking away the ability to fly is effectively denying a person the right to visit relatives across the country or to ever visit Europe.

Should millions of Americans have to tell their parents, who live more than a thousand miles away, that they will likely never see their grandchildren again -just because some anal-retentive liberal bureaucrat in DC came up with a new hair-brained security procedure?

NONE of these new government procedures would have saved a plane. The shoe-bomber was a failure. The “liquid explosive threat” has never brought down a US airliner and the underwear bomber, who inspired this latest round of privacy invasion, was a complete and utter failure.

A bunch of government and ex-government hacks like Michael Chertoff apparently owned stock in Rapiscan (the naked picture machine). You don’t suppose the use of this new machine was motivated more by insider trading than real security issues?