The TSA skit on Saturday Night Live is going viral, because of its parody concerning the new pat down procedures of the TSA. The skit was hilarious, yet intimate. The SNL characters combined the invasive screening procedures with the late night sex-phone invitations.

Are you feeling lonely? You can just book a flight and TSA will help you no longer be lonely! The TSA skit was quite funny. SNL was sure to have sexy, saxophone music tinkling in the background of the skit.

One of the Saturday Night Live lady cast members asked the television viewers, "Do you want to feel contact in certain special places?"

After she asked the odd question, the TSA skit cut over to Bill Hader, Bobby Moynihan and Keenan Thompson, who were posing as Transportation Security Administration officers in uniform. Thompson ruined the sexy moment and piped, "Then why not go through security at an airport?"

Hader then proceeded to flirt with the TV viewers and explained that TSA agents were "standing by" and ready to give us a little "something extra" for the holidays. Oh my goodness!

Next, Moynihan questioned the SNL viewers and said, "What are you waiting for?" Then he seductively snapped his rubber glove! Wow! He makes us think of a little "something extra" at the colonoscopy doctor!

The voiceover then explained to the SNL viewers that they need for more contact is to say "No!" to the TSA full body scan. At the end, the TSA skit stated, "It's our business to touch yours." Gross!

Saturday Night Live is great at mocking the hottest and most controversial stories of the week. This week SNL was targeting the new pat-down procedure that has been launched. The new screening procedure involves a more invasive full body pat down. This TSA procedure has Americans screaming mad, because they feel it invades their "personal business."

SNL, once again, did an amazing job of mocking the top news stories of the week! Check out the video below and let us know what you think of the TSA skit!
