it's rather clear that rosen's "suit" is completely baseless. nothing the "defendants" have said or done satisfies any of the requirements for negligent or intentional infliction of emo distress, nor, obviously, does "DOE III" is a CGWBT" amount to actionable defamation. david rosen, a yale law professor, knows that the claims in his "complaint" are baseless and will inevitably be thrown out of court. he's bringing the suit nonetheless - and it appears that he's doing so for malicious reasons. we cannot let this stand.

Certainly not w/r/t some defendants

"nothing the "defendants" have said or done satisfies any of the requirements for negligent or intentional infliction of emo distress"

I wouldn't be so sure.

"nor, obviously, does "HI is a CGWBT" amount to actionable defamation"

Hey, you finally got something right!

"david rosen, a yale law professor, knows that the claims in his "complaint" are baseless and will inevitably be thrown out of court"

Why, that almost looks like defamation right there!

Clearly you haven't taken the bar exam. Insinuating that someone has herpes is defamation per se. In the majority of jurisdictions, the statement is actionable even if true.

I don't know that this will survive an SMJ challenge because the (c) claims look attackable, but the defamation case isn't flimsy.
