

2009).¹ Each of these three rulings, rather in the nature of short orders, permitted the filing of the settlement agreements under seal. Neither the Cano or Medley decisions address the question of whether settlements of FLSA claims should be filed under seal. The Suda ruling conclusively acknowledges there is a presumption of access, that is, of not sealing settlements, but finds that there is “a sufficient showing” that the amount of the settlement payments be redacted from the agreement that is publicly filed. Suda, 2011 WL 1210206 at *1. Unfortunately, none of these cases address the substantive issue of under what particular circumstances the general doctrine of public access to the courts--coupled with Congress’ specific requirement that FLSA settlements be approved by the court--could yield and justify sealing. See generally U.S. v. Amodeo, 71 F.3d 1044, 1050-53 (2d Cir. 1995). Another decision in the Southern District of New York, Joo v. Kitchen Table, Inc., 763 F. Supp. 2d 643 (S.D.N.Y. 2011), sets forth a reasoned analysis for sealing FLSA settlements. In the Joo case, the court noted that it was unable to find any case that considered the question and holds that the presumption of public access “does not attach to FLSA settlement.” Id at 646. The Joo court concluded by stating that it “joined the overwhelming consensus of district courts” that have considered the issue to hold that an FLSA settlement cannot be sealed absent some showing that overcomes the presumption of public access.

The only basis put forth by the defendant in this case--as to why the settlement agreement should be sealed and not available to the public--is that its decision to settle with these plaintiffs and to pay the sums that it has agreed to pay are a reflection of this court's rulings on how damages would be calculated were the plaintiffs to prevail at trial, balanced also with the costs of litigating this issue. This rationale seems woefully inadequate to justify the sealing of the settlement. In dealing with employees in any other similar litigation, defendants can explain their reason and justification for the settlement in the case. It is this court's conclusion that this reason falls far short of counteracting the presumption of public access, particularly in this area where Congress has required court approval of settlements. The court is hard pressed to understand how the public can judge the reasonableness and the fairness of this court's decision were it to approve or deny the settlement, as required by Congress, if the public does not know what the settlement is.

Therefore, the court denies the defendant's motion to file under seal.

SO ORDERED.
