

summary description. (D.I.14). The Court interpreted that submission as an explanation for why the Plaintiff had not to date submitted a brief, and ordered Plaintiff to file a brief containing an argument as to why summary judgment should be granted in his favor by February 6, 2012. (D.I. 15).

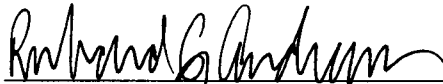

3. On February 6, Plaintiff filed one paragraph generally requesting help due to his health, accompanied by sealed medical records and an application for public assistance dated January 2012. (D.I. 16, 17).¹ These submissions do not present any argument as to why summary judgment on the September 2010 denial of benefits should be granted in his favor.

4. The Court has reviewed the ALJ's decision, without the benefit of any assistance from the Plaintiff. The ALJ generally credited the Plaintiff's treating physicians, and appears to have adequately explained his decision, including his decision not to credit the claimant's cardiologist's opinion, stated on a one-page "check the box" form, that the Plaintiff could not work. Tr. 22. In a nutshell, the Plaintiff's two main physical complaints appear to have been coronary artery disease status post-stenting and seizure disorder. The Plaintiff reported that he walked an hour a day and had the capacity to lift up to 20 pounds. After the time when he was reporting that he was disabled, he injured his leg playing basketball. Tr. 574. Based on the Court's review of the record, it appears that the Plaintiff genuinely had medical impairments, but the record also demonstrates substantial evidence that he could have performed light sedentary work, and that such work was available. Therefore, the Court's opinion, unaided by any useful input from the Plaintiff,² is that the Administrative Law Judge's denial of benefits was based on substantial evidence. See 42 U.S.C. § 405(g).

5. The Court will dismiss this action for failure to prosecute, without prejudice. See McCloud v. Massanari, 13 Fed. Appx. 547, 2001 WL 710882 (9th Cir. 2001). A separate order will be entered.
