OPINION AND ORDER

While housed in the Residential Treatment Unit (“RTU”) at the Cook County Jail because of certain medical conditions, Plaintiffs Maurice Fulson and Henry Ford contracted the coronavirus. Plaintiffs have separately sued Defendants Thomas Dart, the Sheriff of Cook County, Illinois, in both his official and individual capacities, and Cook County,¹ seeking damages for injuries they sustained while detained. In nearly identical complaints, Plaintiffs allege claims of unconstitutional conditions of confinement and shackling by excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Dart now moves to dismiss Plaintiffs’ complaints under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim. Plaintiffs have sufficiently pleaded enough facts to allege a plausible claim for unconstitutional conditions of confinement and excessive force against Dart in his official capacity. However, because Plaintiffs have failed to allege that Dart knew of the specific circumstances that allegedly give rise to their excessive force claims, the Court dismisses Plaintiffs’ claims against Dart in his individual capacity.

¹ Plaintiffs bring their claims against Cook County pursuant to Carver v. Sheriff of LaSalle County, 324 F.3d 947, 948 (7th Cir. 2003), which clarified that “a county in Illinois is a necessary party in any suit seeking damages from an independently elected county officer (sheriff, assessor, clerk of court, and so on) in an official capacity.” As such, the Court only addresses Dart going forward.

BACKGROUND²

Dart is the Sheriff of Cook County. Fulson and Ford were pretrial detainees at Cook County Jail during the relevant time period. Both Fulson and Ford suffer from diabetes and high blood pressure, and Fulson has only one kidney. Due to their medical conditions, Cook County Jail considered Fulson and Ford medically compromised and placed them in the RTU.

Since January of 2020, Dart knew that the coronavirus posed a high risk to the health and well-being of detainees at Cook County Jail. Despite this knowledge, Dart failed to provide the detainees with sufficient hygiene products, cleaning supplies, and proper personal protective equipment (“PPE”), including gowns, face-shields, gloves, and bleach; did not frequently clean or disinfect high-touch surfaces and objects; and did not implement social distancing strategies for detainees residing in the RTU.

By March of 2020, Cook County Jail likely had multiple cases of coronavirus, with several detainees assigned to the RTU exhibiting coronavirus symptoms. In April, Plaintiffs contracted the coronavirus and fell very ill. Cook County Jail transferred them to Stroger Hospital for treatment. Per Dart’s instructions, both Fulson and Ford, like all other detainees hospitalized at outlying hospitals, were shackled by hand and foot to their hospital beds. The restraints caused Plaintiffs significant pain and limited their ability to position themselves in a way that would assist with their breathing and allow them to recover from symptoms of the coronavirus. Because the restraints prohibited Plaintiffs from using the restroom, they urinated and defecated on themselves.

² The Court takes the facts in the background section from Plaintiffs’ complaints and presumes them to be true for the purpose of resolving Dart’s motions to dismiss. See Phillips v. Prudential Ins. Co. of Am., 714 F.3d 1017, 1019–20 (7th Cir. 2013).

LEGAL STANDARD

A motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) challenges the sufficiency of the complaint, not its merits. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6); Gibson v. City of Chicago, 910 F.2d 1510, 1520 (7th Cir. 1990). In considering a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the Court accepts as true all well-pleaded facts in the plaintiff's complaint and draws all reasonable inferences from those facts in the plaintiff's favor. Kubiak v. City of Chicago, 810 F.3d 476, 480–81 (7th Cir. 2016). To survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, the complaint must assert a facially plausible claim and provide fair notice to the defendant of the claim's basis. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678 (2009); Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555 (2007); Adams v. City of Indianapolis, 742 F.3d 720, 728–29 (7th Cir. 2014). A claim is facially plausible “when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.” Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678.

ANALYSIS

I. Unconstitutional Conditions of Confinement Claim

Dart argues that Plaintiffs have failed to allege facts to support their claims that they were subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement that led to them contracting the coronavirus. The Fourteenth Amendment governs claims by pretrial detainees regarding their conditions of confinement.³ See Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.3d 816, 821–22 (7th Cir. 2019). To state a claim, Plaintiffs must allege that Dart “acted purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly” and that his conduct was objectively unreasonable. McCann v. Ogle Cnty., 909 F.3d

881, 886 (7th Cir. 2018) (citing Miranda v. Cnty. of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 353–54 (7th Cir. 2018)). Objective unreasonableness “turns on the facts and circumstances of each particular case.” Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 397 (2015) (citation omitted) (internal quotation marks omitted). “When evaluating reasonableness, . . . courts must afford prison administrators wide-ranging deference in the adoption and execution of policies and practices that in their judgment are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security.” Mays v. Dart, 974 F.3d 810, 820 (7th Cir. 2020) (citing Henry v. Hulett, 969 F.3d 769, 783 (7th Cir. 2020)) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Here, Dart does not seem to challenge whether Plaintiffs have sufficiently pleaded the requirement of knowing conduct. In any event, Plaintiffs satisfy this requirement; they allege that Dart knowingly failed to take reasonable steps to stop the spread of coronavirus at the Cook County Jail. Dart instead focuses on whether Plaintiffs satisfied the objective unreasonableness requirement, arguing that he took unprecedented measures to address the spread of coronavirus. In support, Dart points to the Seventh Circuit’s ruling in Mays v. Dart, another case challenging coronavirus prevention measures at the Cook County Jail. Id. But, as other courts in this district have concluded with respect to nearly identical claims, Mays does not conclusively establish the objective reasonableness of Dart’s actions. See Albarran v. Dart, No. 21 C 1024, 2022 WL 1556103, at *3 (N.D. Ill. May 17, 2022) (concluding that Mays did not require dismissal of unconstitutional conditions of confinement claims against Dart and collecting cases); Brown v. Dart, No. 20-CV-4193, 2021 WL 4401492, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 25, 2021) (explaining that “[t]he Mays cases neither indisputably nor definitively establish that [Dart’s] response to the coronavirus was objectively reasonable” (citation omitted) (internal quotation mark omitted)); Cullom v. Dart, No. 20 C 4034, 2020 WL 7698366, at *2 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 27, 2020) (rejecting defendants' contention that Mays precludes claims against Dart regarding his response to the coronavirus); Gama v. Dart, No. 20 C 3449, 2020 WL 6802030, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 19, 2020) (rejecting Dart's reliance on the district court's findings in Mays). Although the Seventh Circuit noted that Dart "took numerous proactive measures to prevent the spread of COVID-19," it emphasized that it was "not address[ing] the merits of whether Plaintiffs have demonstrated that they have suffered a constitutional violation" and instead only considered potential legal errors the district court committed in evaluating whether to grant a preliminary injunction. Mays, 974 F.3d at 815, 822. Thus, Mays does not definitively establish that Dart's response to the coronavirus cannot meet the objective unreasonableness standard. See MacDonald v. Chicago Park Dist., 132 F.3d 355, 357–58 (7th Cir. 1997) (a decision on a preliminary injunction "is not a decision on the merits of the plaintiff's suit" (quoting Ayres v. City of Chicago, 125 F.3d 1010, 1013 (7th Cir. 1997))); Cullom, 2020 WL 7698366, at *2 (refusing to give Mays preclusive effect because it involved a ruling on a preliminary injunction request).

Dart also argues that Plaintiffs' allegations are not plausible. In their complaints, Plaintiffs allege that Dart failed to take reasonable steps to stem the spread of the coronavirus by failing to provide adequate PPE and sufficient hygiene and cleaning supplies, adequately sanitize common areas, and implement social distancing strategies. Rather than explaining why these allegations fail to meet the plausibility standard, Dart highlights various steps he took to stem the spread of the coronavirus at the Cook County Jail that purportedly contradict Plaintiffs' allegations. But this is a question for a later stage; on a motion to dismiss, the Court must take the facts as alleged in the complaints and draw all inferences in Plaintiffs' favor, without considering Dart's counter-facts. See Brown, 2021 WL 4401492, at *4 (refusing to consider defendants' arguments that they "took a more aggressive approach to COVID-19 prevention" because “any counter-facts or affirmative defenses pose questions for a later stage” (internal quotation marks omitted)); Cullom, 2020 WL 7698366, at *2 (“[D]efendants also cite in support of dismissal the efforts that [Dart] undertook to address the coronavirus outbreak The problem with this argument is that it relies on claimed facts that are not contained in the complaint.”). Although Plaintiffs may not ultimately be able to prove their claims, at this stage, Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that Dart’s actions were “insufficient to protect the medically vulnerable,” including Plaintiffs, whose medical conditions created a higher risk of contracting the coronavirus. Gama, 2020 WL 6802030, at *3; see also Cullom, 2020 WL 7698366, at *3 (allowing plaintiff to proceed on conditions of confinement claim against Dart in his official capacity concerning coronavirus prevention measures at the Cook County Jail).

II. Shackling Claim

Dart next challenges Plaintiffs’ claim that the Cook County Jail’s restraint policy violates the Fourteenth Amendment.⁴ The Due Process Clause prohibits the use of bodily restraints in a way that serves to punish a pretrial detainee. May v. Sheahan, 226 F.3d 876, 884 (7th Cir. 2000). “The use of bodily restraints constitutes punishment . . . if their use is not rationally related to a legitimate non-punitive government purpose or they appear excessive in relation to the purpose they allegedly serve.” Id. (citation omitted).

Plaintiffs agree that shackling advances a valid non-punitive governmental purpose. See Hart v. Sheahan, 396 F.3d 887, 893 (7th Cir. 2005) (“[T]he detention facility has an interest in . . . preventing escapes.”); May, 226 F.3d at 884 (“Certainly, shackling all hospital detainees reduces the risk of a breach of security and thus furthers a legitimate non-punitive government purpose.”). But they argue that the application of the shackling policy in their cases was excessive in relation to its escape-prevention purpose. See May, 226 F.3d at 884 (finding that policy of continuously shackling an AIDS patient to a bed while under the constant watch of a guard was “plainly excessive in the absence of any indication that the detainee pose[d] some sort of security risk”). Plaintiffs allege that Stroger Hospital treated them for severe cases of coronavirus; Fulson had difficulty breathing and felt significant pain, and Ford was placed on a respirator. Plaintiffs further allege that armed guards constantly monitor the wing on which most detainees reside at Stroger Hospital. In their response, Plaintiffs clarify that they themselves were guarded continuously by correctional officers.⁵ They also allege that the continuous restraint of their hands and feet caused significant pain and limited their ability to position themselves, preventing them from breathing more easily. Although Dart argues that Plaintiffs offer only conclusory allegations that they did not pose a security risk and attempts to distinguish this case from May, the Court finds Plaintiffs’ allegations that they had difficulty breathing and were ill and weak because of the coronavirus, coupled with their assertions that armed guards monitored them, sufficient to suggest that the application of the shackling policy was excessive as to Plaintiffs. See Brown, 2021 WL 4401492, at *4 (finding “the allegations that Brown was suffering from coronavirus, was having difficulty breathing, and had previous chronic medical conditions that limited his mobility” sufficient to infer that he was not a security risk and did not require shackling, even though he did not “specifically allege that he was ‘shackled to his bed 24 hours-a-day or that an armed guard was present 24 hours-a-day’” (citing May, 226 F.3d at 884)); Gama, 2020 WL 6802030, at *4 (finding plaintiff’s contentions in his response to Dart’s motion to dismiss “that he had difficulty breathing and that he was very weak . . . sufficient to infer that he was not a security risk and did not require shackling”). And because Plaintiffs have alleged “that the shackling took place, and thus the violation of [their] constitutional rights was caused,” because of a common Sheriff’s Office policy and practice, they may proceed on their claim against Dart in his official capacity under Monell. Cullom, 2020 WL 7698366, at *4.

However, Plaintiffs have not sufficiently alleged Dart’s liability in his individual capacity. “It is well established that [f]or constitutional violations under § 1983 . . . a government official is only liable for his or her own misconduct.” Perez v. Fenoglio, 792 F.3d 768, 781 (7th Cir. 2015) (alteration in original) (citation omitted) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Brown, 2021 WL 4401492, at *4 (“Individual liability under Section 1983 requires a defendant’s personal involvement in the alleged constitutional violation.” (citing Perez, 792 F.3d at 781)). Because “the policy [of shackling detainees] is not inherently unconstitutional, . . . to hold Dart liable for how it was applied to plaintiff[s] requires allegations that Dart personally participated in that application.” Gama, 2020 WL 6802030, at *4. Although Plaintiffs allege that Dart knew of the practice of shackling seriously ill inmates, they have failed to plausibly allege that Dart knew of Plaintiffs’ particular circumstances. See id. (dismissing nearly identical individual-capacity claim against Dart where plaintiff alleged only that Dart “was aware of the widespread policy of shackling detainees while at the hospital”); see also Brown, 2021 WL 4401492, at *4 (“Brown has not plausibly alleged that Dart was aware of any of his particular conditions, and therefore has failed to state a claim against Dart in his individual capacity.”). The Court therefore dismisses Plaintiffs’ individual-capacity claims against Dart. See Cullom, 2020 WL 7698366, at *4 (dismissing plaintiff’s individual-capacity shackling claim against Dart where his complaint did not allege that Dart was aware of the plaintiff's particular circumstances).⁶

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court grants in part and denies in part Dart's motions to dismiss Plaintiffs' complaints [No. 22-1894, Doc. 20; No. 22-2064, Doc. 15]. The Court dismisses the shackling claim against Dart in his individual capacity.

⁶ Because Plaintiffs fail to state a claim against Dart in his individual capacity, the Court need not consider whether qualified immunity would otherwise bar the claim.
