Fight Far Cry

Have you been targeted by US Copyright Group's mass copyright infringement lawsuits? Don't be bullied into settlement fraud — fight back!

The US Copyright Group ("USCG") is an alias of the Virginia law firm Dunlap, Grubb & Weaver PLLC ("DGW"). They've launched an unprecedented volume of predatory lawsuits, suing in 2010 alone almost 20,000 unnamed "John Doe" defendants whom they allege illegally downloaded or uploaded certain movies, such as Far Cry.

Using questionable technology and strong-arm tactics, DGW and USCG track down alleged downloaders and send out "demand letters" full of false claims and empty threats, seeking to pressure alleged infringers into settling their claims quickly and out of court. But many of their claims about Far Cry don't hold water.

Q. I received a demand letter that offers to settle for $1,500 to $2,500, if I pay up right away. Is that a good deal?

FACT: It's been more than ten months since USCG filed its claim of copyright infringement and started sending out coercive demand letters. And they still haven't named a single defendant. Until they do, some critics will say that this is just a settlement racket, and DGW's not going to sue anyone. And many of the infringing acts that DGW alleges don't support extraordinary remedies like statutory damages.

Q. The demand letter says they can take me to court and try to get a judgment of up to $150,000 for downloading a single movie. Is that really possible?

FACT: No. $150,000 is the maximum statutory damages award available under the Copyright Act, for acts of willful infringement, but there has never been a
