

ban of a “rest in peace” T-shirt honoring a student allegedly killed by a member of a rival gang, the Defendants presented uncontroverted evidence that when the ban was imposed they had information that reasonably led them to believe the T-shirts would cause a substantial disruption of, or interference with, school activities. The Defendants demonstrated that T-shirts bearing the initials “R.I.P.,” and memorializing individuals associated with—or believed to be associated with—gangs<sup>2</sup>, are gang insignia perceived as “call-outs” challenging rival gangs, and may elicit violent responses from gang members, affiliates, or “wannabes.” The Plaintiffs later volunteered to remove the initials “R.I.P.” from the T-shirts. By the time that offer was made, however, the shirts and other paraphernalia at issue in this case were so closely associated with the killing of Julius Robinson that the Defendants reasonably concluded that the danger posed by the items could not be mitigated.

The Court concludes that the Defendants met their burden under Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503 (1969), demonstrating a specific and preponderance of the evidence. At trial, however, Nick Kuhr testified that he wore the shirt because it matched his pants and because his family had a large supply of the shirts, ensuring that he could always find a clean one. Dan Kuhr testified that he designed the shirts to make money for his friend’s family to help pay for the friend’s funeral and gravestone, and that he wore the shirt in hopes that other students would buy shirts and to help him with his personal grief. Jeanne Kuhr testified that the shirts were not meant to communicate any message. Cassie, however, wore the shirt and a wristband and wrote Julius’s name on her arm in an effort to protest the ban on the shirts.

<sup>2</sup> The Defendants presented evidence that Julius Robinson was at one time associated with the gang known as Omaha Mafia Bloods, then later disassociated himself from that gang and was a co-founder of a new gang associated with the Crips, an historic rival of the Bloods. Uncontroverted evidence at trial indicated that he was shot and killed after posting a statement on electronic social media, disrespectful of the Omaha Mafia Bloods.

significant fear that Cassie's expressive conduct would cause a disruption of school activities, and that their expectation of disruption was well-founded. No reasonable jury would have a legally sufficient evidentiary basis to find otherwise.

IT IS ORDERED:

1. The Defendants' Supplemental Motion for Directed Verdict as to Plaintiff, Cassie Kuhr (Filing No. 129) is granted; and
2. A separate Judgment will be entered in favor of the Defendants.
