Concerning: Dutch objections and concerns Google Book Settlement

Dear Mr. McMahon,

The Author's Guild et al v. Google Inc. We are writing to you in regards tot the proposed Settlement Agreement between Google Inc. and the Authors guild and the Association of American Publishers.

Doc. 694

The Dutch Publishers Association (NUV) represents the publishers of books, newspapers and magazines in the Netherlands. Thema Publishers hereby declares that it fully subscribes the concerns and objections as stated by The Dutch Publishers Association in their letter to you dated 1 September 2009. Please find a copy of this letter enclosed. We hope that the U.S. District Court will seriously consider the objections and remarks made in this letter.

Yours sincerely,

Betreft: Dutch objections and concerns Google Book Settlement

Dear Mr. McMahon,

The Dutch Publishers Association (NUV) represents the publishers of books, newspapers and magazines in the Netherlands. We are writing to you in regards to the proposed Settlement Agreement between Google Inc., and the Authors Guild and the Association of American Publishers. We would like to raise the following concerns and objections to this Settlement.

- Consequences for European rightholders

First of all we would like to express our concerns about the fact that it appears to be possible for American parties to propose a settlement in the United States (US), that has also consequences for European rightholders, who weren't involved at all in the settlement with Google, and who have still exclusive rights on their works. According to European Copyright Law it is not allowed to digitize copyright protected works and make these available to the public without the explicit consent of the rightholders. If a party would like to use a copyright protected work, he can contact the publisher and try to conclude a licensing agreement (opt-in). The current proposal for the Settlement seems to be the world turned upside down, as per the settlement Google can make use of copyright protected works from all over the world (available in American libraries) without the prior consent of rightholders, as long as these rightholders do not opt-out of the Settlement. We would very much like to contribute to a broad offer of digital content and if necessary are willing to cooperate with other parties, but always with respect for copyright and on the conditions proposed by the rightholders, prior to any digitization by Google.

- Deadline for making objections or opting out and making other decisions still too short

We were glad that the deadline for making objections or opting out was postponed earlier this year. As however European rightholders weren't part of the negotiations, they should have enough time to consider the various consequences of the settlement for them and should have enough time to make a decision with regard to the settlement. Also because of the objections mentioned in this letter, and because of the ongoing investigation of the European Commission on the effect of the Google Book Settlement Agreement on the European publishing sector, European authors, European consumers and society at large (a hearing of the European Commission will take place on 7 September 2009), the deadline for making objections or opting out is still too short and should therefore be postponed. This would subsequently mean that the deadline for claiming cash payments and removing works also has to be postponed.

Just before finishing this letter, we have received a (draft) letter in which the settlement parties Google, AAP and the Author's Guild try to give a practical solution for the objections with regard to the definition of 'commercially available', the basis for determination of the commercial availability, the quality of the database and the representation of non-US rightsholders in the Book Rights Registry. We would prefer if these solutions will be integrated in the settlement itself.

If the proposed changes by the settlement parties will be accepted by the US Court, this will partly take away some of our worries. As we however at the moment don't have any certainty about this, we still would like to inform you about the following concerns and objections:

- Determination of commercial availability

According to section 1.28 of the proposed agreement Google will initially classify a book as 'commercially available' if Google determines that the rightsholder of such book, or the rightsholder's designated agent, is, at the time in question, offering the book for sale through one or more then-customary channels of trade in the United States.

As a consequence of this very narrow definition, a lot of European books are currently considered as non commercially available (while they are still commercially available in Europe). Also the settlement doesn't seem to take into account that a book can be out of print, but still be commercially available as an e-book or being offered as 'printing on demand' (POD).

The determination of the commercial availability of a book is very important, because it is used to determine the default display uses under the settlement. A commercially available book will be automatically removed from display uses while a non-commercially available book will require action from the rightsholder. Unless European publishers change the classification one-by-one, which places an unnecessary administrative burden on them, European books will be tagged as non-commercially available and Google will be exploiting the book commercially as foreseen in the settlement.

As far as exclusive rights are concerned, the rightsholder should be the one who can determine whether a book is still commercially available or not. In practice this seems not to be the case, as wrong information in the database of Google is very hard to change or cannot be changed at all by the publisher.

- Bad quality of the database

According to section 3.2 (d) (i) of the settlement "Google shall determine whether a Book is Commercially Available or not Commercially Available based on an analysis of multiple third-party databases as well as an analysis of the Book's retail availability based on information that is publicly available on the Internet. When analyzing the third-party databases, Google will use the publishing status, product availability and/or availability codes to determine whether or not the particular database being used considers that Book to be offered for sale new through one or more then-customary channels of trade in the United States".

For the correct functioning of the system, it is critical which third-party databases Google uses to determine the commercial availability of a book. Therefore, Google should commit in the settlement to use non-US, such as European, metadata providers and contact publishers to ensure that they have correct information regarding whether a book is commercially available in Europe or not. This must be done prior to making any display uses under authorisations in the settlement agreement.

The management of bibliographic and rights information in the database on the website of the Google Book Settlement leads to a lot of practical problems. It is therefore urgent that the quality and functioning of the database is improved in order to allow rightholders to make full use of it. Currently, it is extremely burdensome and confusing for an European publisher to claim books in the database. For example, section 3.2(d)(i) of the settlement refers to the need to group books together if a book is commercially available and a previous edition is also in the database. In this case, both books would have to be tagged as commercially available in order to avoid "cannibalisation" of new editions. This is however currently not the case, at least for European books, leading to lengthy and costly processes for the publishers, who have to claim the same book several times to be sure that it will be tagged as commercially available. A correct functioning of the database in practical terms should be a pre-condition before any display uses foreseen in the settlement are allowed.

- Uncertainty about digitization status

Another point is that the database gives the rightholder no certainty about the digitization status of a book. If it has not been digitized on or before May 5, 2009, the claim form does not give any certainty about whether the book will still be digitized by Google or not. A rightholder should not have to check this everytime, but be informed by Google about this.

- Lack of representation of non-US rightholders in the Book Rights Registry (BRR)

Section 6.2 (b) of the settlement establishes that the "Registry will be organized on a basis that allows the Registry, among other things to (i) represent the interest of Rightholders in connection with this settlement Agreement...The Registry will have equal representation of the Author Sub-Class and the Publisher Sub-Class on its Board of Directors..."

The BRR will represent rightholders world wide negotiating on their behalf very important matters including terms of new revenue models. It is unfair that nothing in the settlement ensures that there will be non-US publishers and authors in the Board of the BRR. Such a commitment is necessary in order to protect the interests of non-US copyright owners.

We hope that the U.S. District Court will seriously consider the objections and remarks made in this letter. As we as a publishers association are not directly part of the class members, we have also advised our publishers to sent this letter directly to your Court.

Yours sincerely,

Geert Noorman
