

Exhibit 19

OutFront

Gnutella Wants You

Aliya Sternstein, 11.10.03

Back to A Bas La France

The U.S. Army could spend $12 million making and distributing CD copies of a new videogame recruiting tool. Or it could spend virtually nothing and distribute the game on a file-sharing service better known for illicit downloads of music, movies and pornography. Tough call? Not for the Army, which is distributing the game on a Gnutella file-sharing network known as Lime Wire. The Army's Colonel Casey Wardynski insists Gnutella is just fine, while acknowledging the anarchy of file-sharing. "It might be that our game is also on Kazaa," he shrugged. "That I'm not sure of." For Gnutella and Lime Wire, isn't this like the Post Office legitimizing Santa Claus in Miracle on 34th Street? Sure, says Greg Bildson, Lime Wire's chief technology officer: "But we feel legitimate all the time."

Back to A Bas La France