

pages in length -- are tables explaining why the relevant documents are not privileged or otherwise protected from disclosure, and include citations to the record, as well as one case citation. (Exhs. A & B, attached to Pl. Motion to Compel).

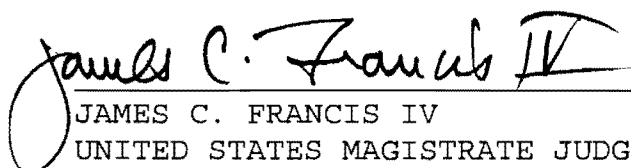

On October 16, 2013, Judge Kaplan referred the motion to compel, as well as two other outstanding discovery motions and all subsequent discovery motions (which are, distressingly, all too likely) to me. (Order of Reference dated Oct. 16, 2013). On October 17, 2013, the defendants filed this motion to strike, which contends that the first two exhibits to the motion to compel "are not exhibits at all; they contain four pages of charts with single-spaced legal and factual arguments in further support of [the] [p]laintiffs' [m]otion, effectively doubling the number of pages permitted by the Court." (Def. Strike Memo. at 2). On that same date, the defendants filed their opposition to the motion to compel, which consists of six pages of argument. (Defendants' Opposition to Plaintiffs' Motion to Compel Documents Withheld as Privileged and/or Work Product).

The motion to strike is frivolous, at best. Whether or not the plaintiffs' motion to compel violated Judge Kaplan's individual rules is no longer relevant. The motion is before me now, and my individual rules do not impose a four-page limit, a fact that the defendants obviously recognize, as their opposition to the motion to compel runs to six pages.<sup>1</sup>

There has been a serious breakdown in the discovery process in this case, as evidenced by the multitude of discovery motions filed. Indeed, between September 20, 2013, and October 17, 2013, the parties have filed five such motions, including the motion to strike, and counsel for the defendants have indicated that another one is on its way. Counsel should know that this is an unsuitable manner in which to conduct litigation. See, e.g., Family Dollar Stores, Inc. v. United Fabrics International, Inc., No. 11 Civ. 2574, 2012 WL 1123736, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. April 4, 2012) (admonishing counsel for failure to cooperate in discovery). The defendants' motion to strike (Docket no. 191) is denied.

SO ORDERED.

JAMES C. FRANCIS IV
UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

<sup>1</sup> Had Judge Kaplan not referred the motion to compel to me for resolution, the defendants' motion to strike may have been proper, but I express no opinion on whether it would have been advisable. The motion to strike is neither appropriate nor advisable in this circumstance.
