CIVIL ACTION NO. 17-C-

Court)

PLAINTIFFS' CORRECTED OBJECTION TO THE MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE

Plaintiffs object to the Motion for Leave to File Brief Amicus Curiae (Doc. No. 26) (the "Motion") filed by the American Civil Liberties Union of West Virginia Foundation (the "ACLU"). As set forth in Plaintiffs' Reply Regarding Their Motion for a Temporary Restraining Order (Doc. No. 22), which is hereby incorporated by reference, Plaintiffs respectfully object to the Court granting any relief other than remand in this case, including allowing the ACLU to interject its biased views, because this Court does not have subject matter jurisdiction over this action.

Further, the Motion fails to cite any legal authority whatsoever that might permit the ACLU to serve as amicus curiae in this case. The Motion cites only to Rule 29(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which says nothing of amicus curiae briefs, and is wholly irrelevant. Had the ACLU cited to the relevant case law concerning potential amicus briefs in district courts, those authorities, as discussed below, would have revealed that courts exercising their discretion on such matters appropriately consider whether a proposed amicus is biased.¹

More troubling, the ACLU fails to disclose its indisputable and disqualifying bias, notwithstanding that several district courts have noted that impartiality is a key factor to consider when evaluating whether to permit a non-party to serve as amicus curiae. See, e.g., United States v. Gotti, 755 F. Supp. 1157, 1159 (E.D.N.Y. 1991) (denying motion because “[r]ather than seeking to come as a ‘friend of the court’ and provide the court with an objective, dispassionate, neutral discussion of the issues, it is apparent that the NYCLU has come as an advocate for one side.”); Lehigh v. Engle, 535 F. Supp. 418, 420 (N.D. Ill. 1982) (holding that at trial court level, “if the proffer comes from an individual with a partisan, rather than an impartial view, the motion for leave to file an amicus brief is to be denied.”).

From the tone of its brief alone, it is obvious that the ACLU is not a “friend of the court” offering a dispassionate view of the issues. Moreover, the ACLU’s economic motivations for assisting Defendants and its prejudice against Plaintiffs are a matter of public record. As for its economic interests, in November of 2016, Defendant Oliver used “Last Week Tonight with John Oliver” to encourage viewers to donate to numerous left-leaning organizations, which—not surprisingly—resulted in an immediate surge of millions of dollars in donations to the ACLU, among others. See Exhibit A and Exhibit B hereto. Another subsidiary of Defendant Time Warner furthered the effort to add to the ACLU’s coffers by reporting on Oliver’s call for donations the next day. See Exhibit C hereto. Consequently, the ACLU’s statement in the Motion that “no party, party’s counsel, or other person...contributed money intended to fund preparing or submitting the brief” lacks appropriate and complete disclosure. And with respect to the ACLU’s political bias and prejudice against Plaintiffs, that is on public display, and can be easily gleaned from the vulgar language on Exhibit D.
