1 BALMER, C. J.

2 Defendants held an around-the-clock vigil on the steps of the state capitol 3 building to protest the deployment of Oregon National Guard troops to Iraq and 4 Afghanistan. During that vigil, the state police cited defendants for second-degree 5 criminal trespass when they remained on the capitol steps after 11:00 p.m., in violation of 6 a Legislative Administration Committee (LAC) guideline that prohibited "[o]vernight 7 use" of the steps between 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m., except in limited circumstances.
8 Defendants challenged those citations, arguing that the LAC guideline was 9 unconstitutional under Article I, section 8, and Article I, section 26, of the Oregon 10 Constitution -- the provisions protecting free expression and the right to assemble, 11 instruct representatives, and apply for redress of grievances. Defendants also argued that 12 the LAC guideline violated the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. The 13 trial court rejected those arguments and found defendants guilty of second-degree 14 criminal trespass. On appeal, the Court of Appeals similarly rejected defendants' facial 15 challenges to the guideline under the Oregon Constitution, but remanded defendants' as-16 applied challenges to allow defendants to question the legislator co-chairs of the LAC 17 about enforcement of the guideline. Because defendants' state constitutional challenges 18 were unresolved, the Court of Appeals did not reach defendants' First Amendment 19 argument. State v. Babson, 249 Or App 278, 307-08, 279 P3d 222 (2012).

20 On review, defendants renew their challenges to the guideline under Article 21 I, section 8, and Article I, section 26, of the Oregon Constitution, as well as under the 22 First Amendment. The state also sought review, arguing that the Court of Appeals erred

1 when it determined that defendants could support their as-applied challenges under the 2 Oregon Constitution by questioning the two legislator co-chairs of the LAC about "any 3 instructions or other communications" that they might have given or had regarding 4 enforcement of the guideline against defendants. Id. at 302. The state asserts that Article 5 IV, section 9, of the Oregon Constitution -- the Debate Clause -- bars defendants from 6 questioning those legislators.

7 For the reasons set out below, we affirm the Court of Appeals. We 8 conclude that the LAC guideline, on its face, does not violate Article I, section 8, or 9 Article I, section 26, of the Oregon Constitution. To determine whether the LAC 10 guideline was applied unconstitutionally to defendants' expression and assembly, 11 however, we must remand to permit defendants to question the legislator co-chairs of the 12 LAC about their involvement, if any, in enforcement of the guideline against defendants.
13 Taking that testimony into account, the trial court must determine whether enforcement 14 of the guideline against defendants was an impermissible restriction on their protected 15 activities or whether it was a reasonable restriction on the time, place, and manner of 16 their expression and assembly. Because of our resolution of that issue, we do not reach 17 defendants' First Amendment argument.

18 I. FACTS AND PROCEEDINGS BELOW

19 On November 1, 2008, on the steps of the state capitol, Darr began a protest

1 against the deployment of Oregon National Guard troops to Iraq and Afghanistan.¹ Darr 2 chose the capitol steps as the location for her protest because it was the seat of state 3 government "where decisions are made" and because it was a "very public place." The 4 goal of the protest was to compel the Governor to meet with members of the National 5 Guard and their families, to bring public attention to the pending deployment of the 6 National Guard, and, when the legislature was in session, to persuade the legislature to 7 support a bill and resolutions aimed at allowing and encouraging the Governor to avoid 8 deploying the National Guard.

9 Darr's protest took the form of an around-the-clock vigil on the capitol 10 steps, and included fasting, lighting candles, displaying signs, and speaking with the 11 general public, veterans, members of the National Guard, and legislators. The other 12 defendants joined the vigil at different times, and participated in the vigil for varying 13 lengths of time. Some joined the vigil on the capitol steps as early as November 2008, 14 while at least one defendant joined the vigil for a single night in February 2009.

15 Use of the capitol steps is regulated by the Legislative Administration 16 Committee (LAC), which is a joint committee of the Legislative Assembly that, among 17 other things, is charged with making policies for control of the state capitol. See ORS

¹ Where it is necessary to differentiate between defendants, we do so by referring to them by their last names. Cleland filed a separate brief, arguing that the guideline violates Article I, section 26, of the Oregon Constitution, but because we understand all defendants to be incorporating each others' arguments, we do not differentiate between defendants' arguments.

1 173.710 (establishing the LAC); ORS 173.720(1)(g) (describing the duties of the 2 Legislative Administrator, who acts "[p]ursuant to the policies and directions" of the 3 LAC, to include "[c]ontrol [of] all space and facilities within the State Capitol and such 4 other space as is assigned to the Legislative Assembly"); ORS 173.770(1) (providing that 5 the LAC "may adopt rules to carry out its duties"). At the time that Darr began her vigil, 6 the LAC Policies and Guidelines included a guideline regarding overnight use of the 7 capitol steps that read, "Activity shall be held between 7:00 am and 11:00 pm, unless 8 otherwise authorized by the Legislative Administrator. No overnight use." That 9 guideline had been in place for at least eight years, since 2000. After Darr began her 10 vigil, the LAC discussed that guideline at two different meetings. As discussed below, in 11 November 2008, the LAC clarified that it intended the guideline to prohibit overnight use 12 of the capitol steps, and in January 2009, the LAC amended the guideline to remove the 13 Legislative Administrator's discretion to allow overnight use of the steps. The citations at 14 issue in this case occurred after the January 2009 amendment.

15 The LAC first discussed the guideline at a meeting on November 13, 2008, 16 twelve days after Darr began her vigil. At that meeting, members of the LAC stated that 17 the guideline had not been enforced consistently, because the prior Legislative 18 Administrator had authorized groups, on request, to use the capitol steps between the 19 hours of 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m.² The LAC voted to "reaffirm[]" the existing guideline,

² At trial, Darr testified that she never sought authorization from the Legislative Administrator to be on the capitol steps between 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m.

1 including the portion of the guideline that permitted the Legislative Administrator to 2 authorize overnight use of the steps, but the LAC indicated that it intended the guideline 3 to prohibit use of the steps between 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m. The Legislative 4 Administrator understood the LAC to be directing him to deny any requests for use of the 5 steps between 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m., despite the guideline's text allowing him to 6 authorize overnight use.

7 That same day, the Legislative Administrator delivered a letter to Darr, 8 advising her of the text of the reaffirmed guideline and directing her to leave the steps by 9 11:00 p.m. that night and every night to avoid violating the guideline. Darr did not leave 10 the steps, and that night, shortly after 11:00 p.m., the Oregon State Police cited Darr on 11 the capitol steps for second-degree criminal trespass. Two days later, in the early 12 morning hours of November 15, 2008, the state police again cited Darr for second-degree 13 criminal trespass for being on the capitol steps after 11:00 p.m. and before 7:00 a.m. The 14 district attorney did not prosecute those citations, and, as a result, those citations are not 15 at issue in this case. Darr continued her vigil, and, as noted, the other defendants joined 16 her vigil as it progressed.

17 A second LAC meeting occurred a few months later, in January 2009. At 18 that meeting, the LAC amended the text of the capitol steps guideline to remove the 19 Legislative Administrator's discretion to permit use of the steps between 11:00 p.m. and 20 7:00 a.m.: "Overnight use of the steps is prohibited, and activities on the steps may be 21 conducted only between 7:00 am and 11:00 pm, or during hours between 11:00 pm and 22 7:00 am when legislative hearings or floor sessions are taking place." One month later, in

1 February 2009, the state police cited defendants for remaining on the capitol steps 2 between 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m. as part of their vigil. Those are the citations that 3 defendants challenge before this court.

4 The February citations were charged as violations. Defendants challenged 5 those violations by arguing that the LAC guideline was procedurally unconstitutional and 6 that it violated their rights under Article I, section 8, and Article I, section 26, of the 7 Oregon Constitution, as well as under the First Amendment to the United States 8 Constitution. The trial court rejected those arguments and found defendants guilty of 9 second-degree criminal trespass under ORS 164.245(1), which provides that "[a] person 10 commits the crime of criminal trespass in the second degree if the person enters or 11 remains unlawfully * * * in or upon premises." A person "enters or remains unlawfully" 12 when "the premises, at the time of such entry or remaining, are not open to the public or 13 when the entrant is not otherwise licensed or privileged to do so." ORS 164.205(3)(a).
14 Defendants' presence on the capitol steps was "unlawful[]" because the LAC guideline 15 prohibited use of the steps between 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m.

16 On appeal, defendants renewed their arguments that the LAC guideline 17 both was procedurally unconstitutional and violated defendants' substantive constitutional 18 rights under Article I, section 8; Article I, section 26; and the First Amendment. Babson, 19 249 Or App at 282, 284. The Court of Appeals first rejected defendants' procedural 20 arguments, concluding that the legislature has the power to promulgate rules regarding 21 access to the capitol under Article IV, section 17, of the Oregon Constitution, which 22 provides that "[e]ach house shall have all powers necessary for a chamber of the 1 Legislative Branch, of a free, and independent State." Id. at 283. The court further noted 2 that, in some instances, the Oregon Constitution authorizes the Legislative Assembly to 3 enact rules outside the formal legislative process, which supported the court's conclusion 4 that enactment of the guideline outside the formal legislative process was not inherently 5 unconstitutional. Id. Moreover, the court reasoned, the guideline did not offend 6 principles of separation of powers because neither the LAC's authorizing statutes nor the 7 LAC guidelines purported to give the LAC enforcement authority, as defendants had 8 contended.³ Id. at 284.

9 Turning to defendants' challenge under Article I, section 8, of the Oregon 10 Constitution, the Court of Appeals employed the framework described in State v.
11 Robertson, 293 Or 402, 649 P2d 569 (1982). This court has described the Robertson
12 framework as consisting of three categories. See State v. Plowman, 314 Or 157, 164, 838 13 P2d 558 (1992), cert den, 508 US 974 (1993) (describing three categories of Robertson 14 framework). Under the first category, the court begins by determining whether a law is 15 "written in terms directed to the substance of any 'opinion' or any 'subject' of 16 communication." Robertson, 293 Or at 412. If it is, then the law is unconstitutional, 17 unless the scope of the restraint is "wholly confined within some historical exception that 18 was well established when the first American guarantees of freedom of expression were 19 adopted and that the guarantees then or in 1859 demonstrably were not intended to ³ Defendants renew their procedural arguments on review. We reject them without discussion.

1 reach." Id. If the law survives that inquiry, then the court determines whether the law 2 focuses on forbidden effects and "the proscribed means [of causing those effects] include 3 speech or writing," or whether it is "directed only against causing the forbidden effects." 4 Id. at 417-18. If the law focuses on forbidden effects, and the proscribed means of 5 causing those effects include expression, then the law is analyzed under the second 6 Robertson category. Under that category, the court determines whether the law is 7 overbroad, and, if so, whether it is capable of being narrowed. Id. If, on the other hand, 8 the law focuses only on forbidden effects, then the law is in the third Robertson category, 9 and an individual can challenge the law as applied to that individual's circumstances. Id.
10 at 417.

11 In this case, the Court of Appeals noted that defendants had argued that the 12 guideline should be analyzed under the second Robertson category, so the court 13 proceeded directly to that analysis. Babson, 249 Or App at 286. The court concluded 14 that the guideline did not "fall into the second category" because the guideline did not 15 "specify a harm and 'expressly' provide that speech or some other form of intentionally 16 communicative activity [was] one way to cause that harm." Id. at 286-87. The court 17 reasoned that a law must expressly refer to speech to be in the second Robertson category 18 because if "a speech-neutral statute could be declared unconstitutional if its enforcement 19 in some circumstances could interfere with constitutionally protected activity," the effects 20 would be far reaching. Id. at 287. The court posited that such a rule could result in the 21 invalidation of every trespass and arson statute, because those statutes can be enforced to 22 stifle speech and expression. Id. Therefore, because the guideline was speech neutral,

1 the court concluded that defendants could challenge the guideline only under the third 2 category of the Robertson framework, as a law that focused on forbidden effects and had 3 been unconstitutionally applied to their protected expression. Id.

4 In analyzing defendants' as-applied challenge under the third category of 5 Robertson, the Court of Appeals determined that the relevant inquiry was "whether the 6 state's enforcement of the overnight rule against defendants was directed toward 7 defendants' expression or toward some speech-neutral objective." Id. at 290. Although 8 the court found evidence in the record to support the trial court's statement that 9 enforcement of the guideline was not based on the content of defendants' speech, the 10 Court of Appeals noted that it was not required to affirm if erroneously excluded 11 evidence could have affected the outcome of the case. Id. at 290-91. In particular, 12 defendants argued that the trial court had erred in refusing to allow them to question the 13 Legislative Administrator about any discussions that he had had with legislators 14 regarding enforcement of the guideline. The Court of Appeals rejected that argument 15 because defendants had failed to make the necessary offer of proof. Id. at 292-93.
16 Defendants also argued that the trial court had erred in quashing their subpoenas of the 17 legislator co-chairs of the LAC, whom defendants had wanted to question about 18 enforcement of the guideline. To address that argument, the Court of Appeals analyzed 19 Article IV, section 9, of the Oregon Constitution -- the Debate Clause -- and concluded 20 that "defendants were entitled to question the legislators, but only about any instructions 21 or other communications that they might have given to or had with the LAC 22 administrator or others regarding enforcement (as opposed to enactment) of the overnight

1 rule." Id. at 302 (emphasis in original).

2 The Court of Appeals reached similar conclusions when it applied the 3 Robertson framework to defendants' challenge under Article I, section 26, of the Oregon 4 Constitution. The court first reasoned that the guideline was "assembly neutral" because 5 it did not "expressly mention" any of the activities protected under Article I, section 26, 6 nor did it "necessarily imply" that it regulated any of those activities. Id. at 306. As a 7 result, the court concluded that defendants could challenge the guideline under Article I, 8 section 26, only under the third category of Robertson as applied to their circumstances.
9 Similarly to its analysis of the as-applied challenge under Article I, section 8, the court 10 went on to note that defendants were entitled to question the LAC co-chairs about 11 enforcement of the guideline to support their as-applied argument under Article I, section 12 26. Id. at 307-08.

13 The Court of Appeals reversed and remanded so that defendants could 14 question the subpoenaed legislators about enforcement of the guideline. Id. at 308.
15 Because of the potential to resolve defendants' claims under the state constitution on 16 remand, the court determined that it was premature to address defendants' arguments 17 under the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. Id. at 307.

18 On review, defendants renew their arguments under Article I, section 8; 19 Article I, section 26; and the First Amendment. For its part, the state argues that the 20 Court of Appeals erred when it determined that the Debate Clause of the Oregon 21 Constitution does not shield the two legislator co-chairs of the LAC from being 22 subpoenaed and questioned about enforcement of the guideline against defendants. We

1 begin with defendants' challenge under Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution.

2 II. ARTICLE I, SECTION 8, OF THE OREGON CONSTITUTION

3 Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution provides, "No law shall be 4 passed restraining the free expression of opinion, or restricting the right to speak, write, 5 or print freely on any subject whatever; but every person shall be responsible for the 6 abuse of this right."

7 For more than thirty years, this court has analyzed claims under Article I, 8 section 8, using the framework that is described in Robertson, 293 Or 402. As explained 9 above, under the first category of the Robertson framework, a law that is "written in 10 terms directed to the substance of any 'opinion' or any 'subject' of communication" is 11 unconstitutional unless the restriction is wholly confined within an historical exception.
12 Id. at 412. If the law passes that test but "is directed in terms against the pursuit of a 13 forbidden effect" and "the proscribed means [of causing that effect] include speech or 14 writing," then the law falls into the second category of Robertson and is examined for 15 overbreadth. Id. at 415, 417-18. If a law is "directed only against causing the forbidden 16 effects," it falls into the third category of Robertson. Id. at 417. A law that falls into the 17 third category can be challenged by arguing that the law "could not constitutionally be 18 applied to [a person's] particular words or other expression." Id. Defendants argue that 19 the guideline is unconstitutional under each of the three categories of the Robertson

1 framework.⁴

2 A. Robertson Category One

3 Analysis under the first category of Robertson is focused on the text of the 4 law. The court in Robertson framed the inquiry as whether the statute was "written in 5 terms" directed at speech. 293 Or at 412. In subsequent cases, this court continued to 6 emphasize the text of statutes when analyzing them under the first category. In City of 7 Portland v. Tidyman, 306 Or 174, 184, 759 P2d 242 (1988), for example, this court 8 rejected the city's argument that an ordinance restricting the location of adult businesses 9 was focused only on the effects of speech. The court stated that, "If the ordinance were 10 so written, it might well be valid on its face and subject only to scrutiny for valid 11 administration; but it is not so written." Id. (emphasis added). In Tidyman, statutory 12 context in the form of legislative findings about the harmful effects of adult businesses 13 could not save the statute because "[i]t is the operative text of the legislation * * * that 14 people must obey and that administrators and judges enforce." Id. at 184-85. In that 15 case, the court concluded, the operative text targeted the content of expression because it 16 regulated "adult businesses" -- that is, only certain businesses, based on the content of the 17 expressive materials they sold -- rather than the supposed harmful effects of those

⁴ Defendants argue, and the state does not dispute, that the analysis stated in Robertson applies to government limitations on expressive activity on the state capitol steps. We agree. We need not and do not express any opinion as to whether a different analysis would apply to limitations on expressive activities that occur on other types of government property.

1 businesses. Id. at 184-86. Thus, in analyzing a law under the first category of Robertson, 2 this court has looked to the text of the law to see whether it expressly regulates
3 expression. See also City of Hillsboro v. Purcell, 306 Or 547, 555, 761 P2d 510 (1988)
4 (concluding that city ordinance was valid under the first category of Robertson because it 5 "prohibit[ed] uninvited entries to private property or 'calling at residences,' but it [did] not 6 by its terms prohibit speech").

7 Defendants do not argue that the guideline is "written in terms" directed at 8 expression or the content of expression. They nonetheless argue that the guideline is 9 unconstitutional under the first category of Robertson. According to defendants, when 10 determining the "focus" of a law under the first category of Robertson, the analysis must 11 extend beyond the text to include context and legislative history. See State v. Gaines, 346 12 Or 160, 171-72, 206 P3d 1042 (2009) (describing statutory interpretation framework in 13 which court examines text, context, and legislative history). In this case, defendants 14 argue that application of the statutory interpretation framework shows that the focus of 15 the guideline was on ending protests, particularly defendants' vigil, and that the law 16 therefore is invalid under Robertson category one.

17 Defendants are correct that, since Robertson, some of our cases have looked 18 beyond the text of statutes when analyzing them under Article I, section 8. As defendants 19 note, for example, in State v. Stoneman, 323 Or 536, 544, 920 P2d 535 (1996), this court 20 concluded that a law regulating child pornography, by its terms, "described and 21 prohibited commerce in certain forms of communication." Citing PGE v. Bureau of 22 Labor and Industries, 317 Or 606, 610-11, 859 P2d 1143 (1993), the court went on to

1 examine the statute's context, however, to determine whether the analysis should proceed 2 under the first or the second category of Robertson because the statute at issue 3 "prohibited commerce in material, the production of which necessarily involve[d] harm 4 to children." Stoneman, 323 Or at 545-48 (emphasis in original). The court concluded 5 that the statute should be analyzed under the second category of Robertson because the 6 legislature intended to regulate the products of "the underlying acts of sexual exploitation 7 of children," and not the "communicative substance" of the expressive materials. Id. at 8 545, 548 (emphasis in original). The court found support for its conclusion that the 9 statute was directed at harm to children, and not at the communicative substance of the 10 materials, in the context of the statute. Id. at 546-48. Stoneman therefore provides 11 support for defendants' argument that the court should consider context and legislative 12 history in its analysis under the first category of Robertson.

13 This court typically has looked to context and legislative history in Article 14 I, section 8, cases, however, only when there is some question regarding the legislature's 15 intent regarding the meaning or scope of the text of the statute. In Stoneman, for 16 example, the court looked at statutory context to determine whether the legislature 17 intended the text of the statute at issue to regulate expression or the harm inherent in 18 production of that expression, because the text of the statute referred to expressive 19 materials, but the court noted that the production those materials necessarily involved 20 harm to children. Stoneman, 323 Or at 546-48; see also State v. Ray, 302 Or 595, 598, 21 733 P2d 28 (1987) (citing legislative history to support conclusion that law prohibiting 22 harassment "by telephonic use of obscenities" or certain other language was intended to

1 "protect persons from actual injury, not to restrict the content of speech"); State v.
2 Chakerian, 325 Or 370, 378-80, 938 P2d 756 (1997) (examining context to determine 3 whether text proscribing "tumultuous and violent conduct" was intended to reach 4 protected expression under the second category of Robertson); State v. Ausmus, 336 Or 5 493, 499-503, 85 P3d 864 (2003) (examining text and context to "discern the conduct that 6 [the statute] proscribes"). If the meaning or scope of the text of a statute is not in dispute, 7 there is generally no need to apply the statutory interpretation framework described in 8 Gaines.

9 Here, the parties do not disagree about the LAC's intent behind the meaning 10 or scope of the text of the guideline. Although the parties disagree about the LAC's 11 reason for reaffirming and amending the guideline, the parties agree that the guideline 12 prohibits all overnight use of the capitol steps, including protests like defendants' vigil.
13 They also agree that a person can violate the guideline without engaging in expressive 14 activities, if, for example, a person uses the steps as a shortcut while crossing the capitol 15 grounds after 11:00 p.m. (when there are no hearings or floor sessions taking place). In 16 addition, defendants' counsel conceded at oral argument that there are no ambiguous 17 terms in the guideline that require further explanation using context and legislative 18 history. For those reasons, defendants have not demonstrated why this court should 19 examine context and legislative history, when there is no debate about the meaning of the 1 guideline or the conduct that it covers.⁵ Because the guideline is not "written in terms 2 directed to the substance of any 'opinion' or any 'subject' of communication," it is not 3 unconstitutional under the first category of Robertson.

4 B. Robertson Category Two

5 A law falls under the second category of Robertson if it is "directed in 6 terms against the pursuit of a forbidden effect" and the "the proscribed means [of causing

⁵ Even if we were to accept defendants' assertion that we should consider context and legislative history, we are not persuaded that that evidence shows that the LAC's removal of the Legislative Administrator's discretion to allow overnight use of the steps was directed at expression. The context on which defendants rely -- other provisions of the LAC guidelines that regulate specific harms associated with use of the capitol steps, such as alcohol use and litter -- does not illuminate the LAC's decision to amend the rule. The fact that other LAC guidelines regulated some of the harms that members of the LAC identified when discussing the overnight guideline does not necessarily mean that the LAC's removal of the Legislative Administrator's discretion was directed at speech. In fact, multiple LAC members indicated that they were concerned about consistent enforcement of the guideline. That concern suggests that the LAC may have been attempting to avoid restrictions based on expression or the content of expression. In other words, by taking away the Legislative Administrator's discretion, the LAC ensured that the Legislative Administrator would not enforce the guideline based on disapproval of expressive activities in general or the content of expressive activities in particular.

Similarly, the legislative history on which defendants rely, including a statement by Senator Courtney while the vigil was ongoing about "the situation out on the steps," is, at best, ambiguous, particularly given the concerns voiced regarding consistent enforcement. Moreover, although the Legislative Administrator testified that he raised the capitol steps policy at the November LAC meeting because of Darr's vigil, he also explained that he sought clarification of the policy at that meeting because he was the new Legislative Administrator -- appointed from interim to permanent Legislative Administrator at the November meeting -- trying to understand the guideline that he was charged with implementing. There is no indication that the LAC amended the guideline to target speech and expression.

1 that effect] include speech or writing." 293 Or at 415, 417-18. The court examines a 2 statute in the second category for overbreadth to determine if "the terms of [the] law 3 exceed constitutional boundaries, purporting to reach conduct protected by guarantees 4 such as * * * [A]rticle I, section 8." Id. at 410. If a statute is overbroad, the court then 5 must determine whether it can be interpreted to avoid such overbreadth. Id. at 412.

6 Similarly to their argument under the first category of Robertson, 7 defendants do not argue that the text of the guideline includes expression as an element or 8 "proscribed means" of causing targeted harm. Defendants instead argue that, even if the 9 guideline targets some harm -- rather than targeting expression -- the guideline has an 10 "obvious and foreseeable" application to speech, and it is overbroad. That is, defendants 11 argue that the text of the statute does not have to refer to expression or include expression 12 as an element to fall under category two, as long as it has an obvious application to 13 expression. As with their argument regarding category one, defendants seek a more 14 expansive inquiry than Robertson directs, and their argument similarly is not well taken.

15 The Court of Appeals' focus on the text of the guideline in its second 16 category analysis echoes Robertson's emphasis on the text. See Babson, 249 Or App at 17 286-87 (concluding that guideline does not fall into second category because it does not 18 "expressly" provide that expression is a way to cause a regulated harm). In Robertson, 19 this court discussed a second category challenge in terms of whether expression was a 20 statutory element, or was the "proscribed means" of causing some harm. The court's

1 analysis in Robertson focused squarely on the text of the law.⁶ There, the court 2 determined that the coercion statute at issue was "directed in terms against the pursuit of 3 a forbidden effect." Robertson, 293 Or at 415; see also id. at 417 (explaining that 4 forbidden effect was "frightening another person into a nonobligatory and undesired 5 course of conduct"). Nonetheless, the court analyzed the statute for overbreadth because 6 "speech [was] a statutory element." Id. at 415-16 (noting that the statutory element of 7 making a "demand" would require "a communication in words or otherwise" and that the 8 statutory element of "instilling * * * fear" likely would involve "speech or its 9 equivalent"). The court did not have to look beyond the text of the statute -- either to the ⁶ In a footnote, the court in Robertson briefly suggested that legislative history might support a category two challenge if that history showed that the "intended or expected object of the law" was suppression of expression. 293 Or at 417, 417 n 11 (noting that a law directed only at forbidden effects could not be challenged under category one or category two, "[n]ot, at least, without the support of legislative or other background showing that suppression of expression itself was the intended or expected object of the law"). In Robertson, however, speech was a statutory element of the statute at issue, so the court's reference to legislative history and the "intended or expected object of the law" was made in passing, and without elaboration.

This court has since called into question the meaning of that footnote from Robertson. In State v. Illig-Renn, 199 Or App 124, 127-28, 110 P3d 137 (2005), the Court of Appeals stated that that footnote from Robertson indicated that a facial challenge could be maintained, even if a statute was "speech neutral." On review, this court rejected that interpretation, stating that "our prior cases do foreclose the possibility of a facial challenge under Article I, section 8, to a 'speech-neutral' statute." State v. Illig-Renn, 341 Or 228, 234, 142 P3d 62 (2006) (emphasis in original); see also id. at 233 (noting that the Court of Appeals used the phrase "speech neutral" to mean "statutes that do not by their terms forbid particular forms of expression"). Thus, as we recently have emphasized, the footnote from Robertson does not take the focus away from the text of the law under the second category of Robertson.

1 statute's "obvious application" or to context and legislative history -- to determine that the 2 statute should be analyzed for overbreadth under category two.

3 Despite Robertson's explicit emphasis on the text of a statute under 4 category two, defendants point to a passage from that case where, they argue, the court 5 indicated that the inquiry under Article I, section 8, is not so limited. In explaining why 6 the court could not narrow the overbroad coercion statute by judicial interpretation, the 7 court in Robertson stated that "[i]t is, therefore, in the first instance a legislative 8 responsibility to narrow and clarify the coverage of a statute so as to eliminate most 9 apparent applications to free speech or writing, leaving only marginal and unforeseeable 10 instances of unconstitutional applications to judicial exclusion." Id. at 436-37 (emphasis 11 added). Based on that statement, defendants contend that the second category of 12 Robertson applies to laws with obvious or "apparent" applications to speech, while laws 13 with "marginal and unforeseeable" applications to speech are reserved for the third 14 category of analysis.

15 Defendants' argument assumes, however, that the court's statement in 16 Robertson about the legislature eliminating apparent applications to free expression 17 applies to all laws, regardless of whether those laws refer to expression. That is, 18 according to defendants, if it is "apparent" that a law could be applied to speech, it must 19 be examined for overbreadth; even if the legislature is not required to eliminate "every 20 imaginable application" to expression, defendants argue, it must eliminate apparent 21 applications to expression. The state responds that defendants' approach would expand 22 the reach of Article I, section 8, beyond what this court's case law supports.

1 We agree with the state that the statement in Robertson on which 2 defendants rely does not extend Article I, section 8, overbreadth analysis to every law 3 that the legislature enacts. When expression is a proscribed means of causing the harm 4 prohibited in a statute, it is apparent that the law will restrict expression in some way 5 because expression is an element of the law. For that type of law, the legislature must 6 narrow the law to eliminate apparent applications to protected expression. See 7 Robertson, 293 Or at 417-18 (noting that when a law focused on harmful effects includes 8 expression as a proscribed means of causing those effects, the court must determine 9 whether the law "appears to reach privileged communication" (emphasis added)).
10 However, if expression is not a proscribed means of causing harm, and is not described in 11 the terms of the statute, the possible or plausible application of the statute to protected 12 expression is less apparent. That is, in the former situation, every time the statute is 13 enforced, expression will be implicated, leading to the possibility that the law will be 14 considered overbroad; in the latter situation, the statute may never be enforced in a way 15 that implicates expression, even if it is possible, or even apparent, that it could be applied 16 to reach protected expression. When a law does not expressly or obviously refer to 17 expression, the legislature is not required to consider all apparent applications of that law 18 to protected expression and narrow the law to eliminate them. The court's statement in 19 Robertson, on which defendants rely, does not extend the second category overbreadth 20 analysis to statutes that do not, by their terms, expressly or obviously refer to protected 21 expression.

22 Nonetheless, since Robertson, we have recognized that the focus in a

1 second category overbreadth challenge on expression being an element of the law is not 2 unyielding if there is a "clear case" of overbreadth. See State v. Illig-Renn, 341 Or 228, 3 235, 142 P3d 62 (2006) (so stating). In Illig-Renn, the defendant challenged as overbroad 4 a statute that made it a crime to "[r]efuse[] to obey a lawful order by [a] peace officer" if 5 the person knew that the person giving the order was a peace officer. ORS 162.247(1)(b) 6 (1999), amended by Or Laws 2005, ch 668, § 1. In addressing the state's argument that 7 the statute was not subject to an overbreadth challenge because it did not "expressly" 8 restrict expression, this court stated that a statute is subject to a facial challenge -- under 9 the first or second category of Robertson -- if it "expressly or obviously proscribes 10 expression," leaving statutes with "[m]arginal and unforeseen applications to speech and 11 expression" to as-applied challenges under the third category. Illig-Renn, 341 Or at 234.
12 The court went on to clarify that it would not ignore a "clear case of facial 13 unconstitutionality or overbreadth merely because the statute manages to avoid any direct 14 reference to speech or expression." Id. at 235. Nonetheless, the court stated, facial 15 challenges generally would not be permitted "if the statute's application to protected 16 speech [was] not traceable to the statute's express terms." Id. at 236. Based on that 17 interpretation of Article I, section 8, the court concluded that the defendant could 18 challenge the statute that prohibited interfering with a peace officer only as applied, under 19 the third category of Robertson, and not on its face, under the other two categories. Id. at 20 237.

21 Despite the court's apparent conclusion that the statute at issue in Illig-Renn 22 did not "obviously" proscribe expression, the court did provide an example of a statute

1 that would "obviously" proscribe expression. After stating that the court would not 2 ignore a clear case of facial unconstitutionality or overbreadth merely because a statute
3 avoided directly referring to expression, the court cited State v. Moyle, 299 Or 691, 705
4 P2d 740 (1985). Illig-Renn, 341 Or at 235-36. Specifically, the court quoted the portion 5 of Moyle that explained that lawmakers could not evade the protections of Article I, 6 section 8, "simply by phrasing statutes so as to prohibit "causing another person to see" 7 or "to hear" whatever [speech or expression] the lawmakers wish to suppress.'" Illig-
8 Renn, 341 Or at 235-36 (quoting Moyle, 299 Or at 699) (alteration in Illig-Renn). Moyle
9 provides useful context for understanding what the court in Illig-Renn meant when it 10 referred to statutes that "obviously" proscribe expression.

11 In Moyle, this court addressed the constitutionality of a harassment statute 12 that prohibited alarming another person by conveying a telephonic or written threat to 13 inflict serious physical injury or commit a felony. 299 Or at 693. The court determined 14 that the focus of the statute was preventing harm, and expression was one way of causing 15 that harm. Id. at 699. The court explained, however, that even a law written in terms that 16 target harm, rather than expression, could violate Article I, section 8: "The constitutional 17 prohibition against laws restraining speech or writing cannot be evaded simply by 18 phrasing statutes so as to prohibit 'causing another person to see' or 'to hear' whatever the 19 lawmakers wish to suppress." Id. The court went on to note that a difficulty arises when, 20 for example, a crime is defined "in terms of causing a kind of harm which necessarily 21 results only from speech or writing, so that the statutory definition is only the other side 22 of the coin of a prohibition of the speech or writing itself." Id. Moyle recognized that

1 lawmakers could not avoid the protections of Article I, section 8, by phrasing a law to 2 target harm that essentially mirrors protected expression. See id. at 701 ("In short, ORS 3 166.065(1)(d) does not run afoul of Article I, section 8, for the reason that the effect that 4 it proscribes, causing fear of injury to persons or property, merely mirrors a prohibition of 5 words themselves. The statute, however, prohibits causing this effect specifically by 6 words.") The harassment statute in Moyle, however, did not "obviously" proscribe 7 speech by "mirror[ing] a prohibition of words themselves," and the court instead 8 examined the statute for overbreadth because verbal threats were a central element of the 9 crime. Id. at 701-02. The court concluded that it could narrow the statute by judicial 10 interpretation and did not invalidate the statute as overbroad. Id. at 705.

11 When Illig-Renn quoted Moyle in its discussion of a statute that would 12 "obviously" proscribe speech without directly referring to it, the court indicated that it 13 would extend Article I, section 8, scrutiny under the first two Robertson categories to 14 statutes that "mirror[] a prohibition of words," even if they do not expressly mention 15 expression. The court did not use the word "obviously" to extend Article I, section 8, 16 scrutiny to any statute that could have an apparent application to speech; rather, the court 17 used the word "obviously" to make it clear that creative wording that does not refer 18 directly to expression, but which could only be applied to expression, would be 19 scrutinized under the first two categories of Robertson.

20 The outcome in Illig-Renn is consistent with Moyle. As noted, in Illig- 21 Renn, the court examined the constitutionality of a statute that prohibited interfering with 22 a peace officer. The text of the statute did not directly refer to speech, but the statute did

1 have an apparent application to speech. See State v. Illig-Renn, 196 Or App 765, 769-70, 2 103 P3d 1178 (2004), adh'd to as modified on recons, 199 Or App 124, 110 P3d 137
3 (2005), rev'd, 341 Or 228, 142 P3d 62 (2006) (noting that statute at issue in Illig-Renn 4 covered nearly all protected conduct covered by statute held to be overbroad in Ausmus).
5 The statute also could be applied to more than speech, however, and therefore was not a 6 mirror of a prohibition on words. Accordingly, in Illig-Renn, this court concluded that 7 the statute could not be examined under the first two categories of Robertson because it 8 did not expressly or obviously restrain expression. See 341 Or at 236-37.

9 Similarly, here, although the guideline does not directly refer to speech, the 10 guideline does have apparent applications to speech, as defendants contend. A restriction 11 on use of the capitol steps will prevent people like defendants from protesting or 12 otherwise engaging in expressive activities on the capitol steps overnight. That fact 13 alone, however, does not subject the guideline to Article I, section 8, scrutiny under the 14 second category of Robertson. The guideline is not simply a mirror of a prohibition on 15 words. The guideline also bars skateboarding, sitting, sleeping, walking, storing 16 equipment, and all other possible uses of the capitol steps during certain hours. Thus, 17 because the guideline does not expressly refer to expression as a means of causing some 18 harm, and it does not "obviously" prohibit expression within the meaning of Moyle, it is 19 not subject to an overbreadth challenge under the second category of Robertson.

20 C. Robertson Category Three

21 Robertson established that if a statute is "directed only against causing * * * 22 forbidden effects," a person charged with violating that statute by means of expression

1 can bring a constitutional challenge under Article I, section 8, by arguing that the statute 2 "could not constitutionally be applied to his [or her] particular words or other 3 expression." 293 Or at 417. Because the court in Robertson determined that the statute 4 at issue was unconstitutionally overbroad, the court did not further elaborate on the 5 proper analysis for an as-applied challenge. See id. at 435-36 (concluding that law at 6 issue was overbroad and not subject to judicial narrowing). Since Robertson, this court 7 has resolved most Article I, section 8, cases through facial challenges under the first two 8 categories of the Robertson framework, leaving analysis under the third category largely 9 undeveloped.

10 Defendants assert that the as-applied analysis must examine whether the 11 state enforced the guideline against them because of their expression. They argue that 12 testimony from the Legislative Administrator about any discussions that he had with 13 LAC members about enforcement of the guideline, as well as testimony from the LAC 14 co-chairs, could help prove that enforcement of the guideline was directed at suppressing 15 defendants' expression. In response, the state does not expressly disagree that the third 16 category analysis involves an inquiry into whether enforcement was directed at 17 suppressing defendants' expression. The state argues, however, that the trial court 18 properly determined that the guideline was enforced because of defendants' conduct of 19 trespassing on the capitol steps, rather than because of defendants' protected speech. To 20 the extent that this court addresses the testimony that defendants seek, the state argues, 21 defendants cannot challenge the trial court's exclusion of that testimony because there are 22 procedural obstacles. In particular, the state argues, defendants did not make the

1 necessary offer of proof for the Legislative Administrator's testimony and failed to show 2 that the legislators' testimony would be material and favorable to their case.
3 Alternatively, the state argues that the Debate Clause of the Oregon Constitution prevents 4 defendants from calling the legislator co-chairs of the LAC into court to testify about 5 enforcement of the guideline to support their as-applied challenge.

6 This court's most detailed as-applied analysis under Article I, section 8, was 7 in City of Eugene v. Miller, 318 Or 480, 871 P2d 454 (1994). In Miller, the defendant 8 challenged an ordinance that prohibited vendors from selling merchandise on city 9 sidewalks, unless those vendors had a license to sell food, beverages, flowers, or 10 balloons. Id. at 482-83. The defendant was convicted of violating that ordinance after he 11 sold joke books on the sidewalk. In analyzing the ordinance, this court first concluded 12 that it was valid under the first category of Robertson because it banned the sale of all 13 expressive material on the sidewalk and therefore was content neutral.⁷ Id. at 489. The 14 court also held that the ordinance did not fit within the second category of Robertson 15 because it was directed at a harm -- street and sidewalk congestion -- that the city 16 legitimately could seek to prevent, and did not, "by [its] terms, purport to proscribe

⁷ Content neutrality is not necessarily the end of the analysis in every case. As the court in Miller made clear, although "expressive material is not exempt from all 'content-neutral' regulation," that does not mean that expressive material "may be subjected to any 'content-neutral' regulation." Miller, 318 Or at 486-87 (emphasis in original). As an example, the court in Miller suggested that a ban on the sale and distribution of all expressive material within city limits likely would violate Article I, section 8, because "it would restrict too greatly" the right of free expression. Id. at 487.

1 speech or writing as a means to avoid a forbidden effect." Id. at 489-90.

2 The court in Miller nonetheless held that the ordinance was invalid under 3 Article I, section 8, as applied to the defendant's conduct. Id. at 490. In reaching that 4 conclusion, the court stated that "[w]hen a law is challenged 'as applied' under the third 5 Robertson category, the question is whether the law was applied so that it did, in fact, 6 reach privileged communication." Id. Specifically, the court framed the inquiry in that 7 case as whether applying the ordinance to the defendant's sale of joke books 8 "impermissibly burden[ed] his right of free speech." Id. The court determined that the 9 law had been applied to impermissibly burden the defendant's expression because it 10 treated the defendant's sale of expressive material "more restrictively" than it treated the 11 sale of certain other merchandise, and there was no "rational basis" or "reasonabl[e] 12 justif[ication]" for treating the defendant differently. Id. at 491-92. The court left open 13 the question of whether the city could ban all sidewalk vending or whether the city could 14 limit sidewalk vending to goods for which there was a special public need. Id. at 491.

15 Miller arose in a different context than this case does. In Miller, the court's 16 conclusion was based on differences in enforcement required by the text of the ordinance, 17 rather than potential differences in enforcement based on the decisions of the government 18 actors enforcing the law. Despite the more restrictive treatment of the defendant in 19 Miller, there was no indication that the city was targeting expressive activity in general or 20 the content of the defendant's expression in particular in the way that it enforced an 21 otherwise content-neutral ordinance. In contrast, here, defendants argue that the state 22 enforced the guideline against them because of their speech.

1 Although Miller arose in a different context, its general premise applies 2 equally here: a law is invalid as applied to particular expression if "it did, in fact, reach 3 privileged communication," and enforcement of the law against a particular defendant 4 "impermissibly burden[ed] his [or her] right of free speech." Id. at 490. Here, the state 5 does not dispute that enforcement of the guideline against defendants reached -- and 6 burdened -- their expressive activities. This court, however, has acknowledged that some 7 burdens on expressive activities are permissible, such as time, place, and manner 8 restrictions. See, e.g., Outdoor Media Dimensions v. Dept. of Transportation, 340 Or 9 275, 289-90, 132 P3d 5 (2006) (noting that "Article I, section 8, does not bar every 10 content-neutral regulation of the time, place, and manner of speech"); see also State v.
11 Henry, 302 Or 510, 525, 732 P2d 9 (1987) (noting that the court would "not rule out * * * 12 reasonable time, place and manner regulations of the nuisance aspect of [sexually explicit 13 material]"); Tidyman, 306 Or at 182 (noting that "structures and activities unquestionably 14 devoted to constitutionally privileged purposes such as religion or free expression are not 15 immune from regulations imposed for reasons other than the substance of their particular 16 message"). Accordingly, the inquiry is not simply whether defendants' expression was 17 burdened, but whether the burden on defendants' expression was impermissible. See 18 Ausmus, 336 Or at 505 (recognizing that the protection of speech under the Oregon 19 Constitution "is not absolute"). We therefore must consider whether the restriction on 20 defendants' expression arising from enforcement of the guideline was impermissible, or 21 whether it was a permissible restriction on the time, place, and manner of their 22 expression.

1 This court described a general framework for time, place, and manner
2 analysis in Outdoor Media, 340 Or 275. In Outdoor Media, the state cited the petitioner 3 for displaying outdoor advertising signs without the statutorily required permit. Id. at 4 279. On review, the petitioner challenged the citations under Article I, section 8, and this 5 court invalidated one part of the statutory scheme, which regulated on-premises and off-6 premises signs differently, because the court determined that the distinction was content 7 based. Id. at 299. The court also determined, however, that other parts of the statutory 8 scheme were permissible because they were content-neutral restrictions on only the time, 9 place, and manner of expression. Id. at 292. The court considered three factors in 10 determining whether restrictions within the statutory scheme were reasonable limits on 11 the time, place, and manner of expression: (1) whether the law "discriminate[d] on the 12 basis of the subject or content of speech" or "effectively prohibited certain forms of 13 speech" while allowing nonexpressive conduct, id. at 290-91 (emphasis in original); (2) 14 whether the restriction advanced a legitimate state interest without restricting 15 substantially more speech than necessary, id. at 280-81, 291-92, 296 (limiting permits to 16 the number of signs that existed in 1975 "was intended to, and [did]" limit number of 17 signs visible from public highways to further "legitimate safety and aesthetic goals," but 18 prohibiting all billboards might be viewed differently); and (3) whether there were 19 "ample avenues to communicate" the individual's message despite the law's restrictions, 20 id. at 292. The petitioner did not argue that the statutory provisions treated expressive 21 activities more restrictively than nonexpressive activities, so the court did not consider 22 that issue. Instead, the court determined that most of the statutory provisions were

1 content neutral, that they advanced the legitimate state interests identified in the statutory 2 scheme, and that there were ample avenues for the petitioner to communicate its 3 message. Thus, the court upheld most of the statutory provisions as content-neutral time, 4 place, and manner restrictions under Article I, section 8. Id. at 290-92.

5 Although the court in Outdoor Media applied the time, place, and manner 6 analysis under the second Robertson category, id. at 288, that analysis also can be applied 7 under the third category of Robertson. Under the third category, the court must examine 8 how the law was applied to determine whether the application was directed at the content 9 or the expressive nature of an individual's activities, advanced legitimate state interests, 10 and provided ample alternative opportunities to communicate the intended message.

11 We now consider whether enforcement of the guideline against defendants 12 was a reasonable time, place, and manner restriction on defendants' speech, or whether it 13 was an impermissible restriction on privileged expression. We first consider whether the 14 enforcement of the guideline advanced a legitimate government interest without 15 restricting substantially more speech than was necessary. Here, we conclude that the 16 enforcement advanced legitimate government interests in safety, security, and aesthetics.
17 Before trial, the Legislative Administrator explained in an affidavit that his concerns with 18 the vigil were "building security," including risk to the building from fires, "the security 19 of the individuals" on the steps, "cleanliness and litter," and individuals sleeping on the 20 steps.

21 The officers who cited defendants testified that they cited defendants 22 because they were trespassing by being present on the steps overnight. Citing defendants

1 for overnight use of the capitol steps advanced the legitimate objectives identified by the 2 Legislative Administrator by discouraging continuous presence on the steps. The 3 citations likewise advanced the LAC guidelines' objective of "maintaining the Capitol's 4 historical integrity and dignity." See Clark v. Community for Creative Non-Violence, 468
5 US 288, 296, 104 S Ct 3065, 82 L Ed 2d 221 (1984) (concluding that regulation 6 prohibiting camping on park lands outside of designated campgrounds narrowly focused 7 on substantial government interest in "maintaining the parks in the heart of our Capital in 8 an attractive and intact condition, readily available to the millions of people who wish to 9 see and enjoy them by their presence").

10 Even when government is seeking to advance a legitimate interest, it may 11 not restrict substantially more speech than necessary to advance that interest. In Outdoor 12 Media, for example, this court indicated that it might view differently a complete 13 prohibition on billboards, rather than a restriction on the number of billboards. 340 Or at 14 291-92 ("If the state were to prohibit billboards -- or some other form of expression -- 15 entirely, then perhaps there would be reason to consider whether the effect of such a ban 16 'restrain[ed] the free expression of opinion' or 'restrict[ed] the right to speak, write, or 17 print freely' under Article I, section 8." (Alteration in Outdoor Media.)). In fact, this 18 court did invalidate an ordinance that "prohibit[ed] all solicitation for any purpose at any 19 time" in Purcell. 306 Or at 556. There, the court noted that the city likely could "place 20 reasonable limitations on door-to-door solicitations." Id. The court concluded, however, 21 that the ordinance prohibiting solicitation was "far more than a regulation limited to and 22 contained by the consequences the law [sought] to prevent." Id.

1 Similarly, when a law is enforced in a way that restricts "far more" speech 2 than is necessary to advance the government interest, that enforcement is not a reasonable 3 restriction on the time, place, and manner of expression. Here, enforcement of the 4 guideline prevented defendants from using the steps for eight hours each night. Although 5 the guideline restricted the location of defendants' expression during those hours, it did 6 not prohibit that expression from occurring all together. Defendants could protest on the 7 capitol steps 16 hours a day, and there is no indication that defendants were prevented 8 from effectively conveying their message from another location during the eight 9 nighttime hours (or from the capitol steps during those hours when legislative hearings or 10 floor sessions were being held). See Service Employee Intern. Union v. Los Angeles, 114 11 F Supp 2d 966, 971-72 (CD Cal 2000) (invalidating restriction requiring protesters to use 12 "demonstration site" 260 yards away from site of Democratic National Convention 13 because restriction was in place 24 hours a day and covered more area than necessary).
14 We therefore conclude that the guideline advanced the government's legitimate interests 15 without restricting substantially more speech than necessary.⁸

⁸ As defendants note, at least some of the Legislative Administrator's concerns could have been addressed under other provisions of the LAC guidelines. His concern about cleanliness, for example, arguably could have been addressed under the guideline requiring users to leave the steps in "a neat and clean condition"; his concern about the security of the building and defendants could have been addressed under the guideline requiring users to "comply with the laws regarding public access and safety." The requirement that the enforcement advance a legitimate government interest, however, does not require the government to regulate defendants only on the narrowest ground possible. Cf. Tidyman, 306 Or at 189 (noting that neutral regulation to limit traffic and noise by excluding retail business from residential area may be applied to businesses that

1 Second, we consider whether there were ample alternative avenues for 2 defendants to communicate their message, and we conclude that there were. As noted, 3 they could communicate their message on the capitol steps for 16 hours per day -- the 4 hours when the intended recipients of their message were most likely to be present -- and 5 overnight when legislative hearings or floor sessions were being held. Moreover, as 6 explained above, there is no indication in the record that the capitol steps were the only 7 place where defendants could effectively communicate their message during the other 8 eight hours. Defendants' testimony that the location of the protest on the capitol steps 9 was important to their message is not dispositive in this case because there is no 10 indication that they were unable to effectively communicate their message at or near that 11 location at all times. Cf. Outdoor Media, 340 Or at 291-92 (acknowledging that certain 12 means of communicating, such as outdoor advertising signs, might have characteristics 13 that make them "uniquely suited to conveying certain messages to certain audiences," but 14 nonetheless upholding restrictions on the number of signs permitted). We conclude that, 15 although the location of defendants' protest was important to them, enforcement of the 16 guideline did not leave defendants without ample alternative locations to effectively 17 communicate their message during the eight hours each night when the capitol steps were 18 closed.

19 The final inquiry is whether the guideline was enforced against defendants generate little noise).

1 because of their expression. Defendants first argue that the state's failure to enforce the 2 guideline against others who used the capitol steps between 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m.
3 demonstrates that they were targeted because of the content of their expression or 4 because they were engaged in expression. In particular, defendants argue that "[n]o one 5 seemed concerned about overnight presence on the Capitol steps while the Bible was 6 being read or basketball was being played," referring to a group that previously had been 7 authorized to use the capitol steps for a 24-hour Bible reading marathon and a group that 8 had stored basketball equipment on the capitol steps overnight. Both groups, however, 9 were allowed to use the steps overnight only before the new Legislative Administrator 10 was appointed and when the Legislative Administrator had discretion to allow overnight 11 use of the steps. The citations at issue in this case took place after the guideline was 12 amended to remove that discretion, and, on this record, defendants were the only 13 individuals who violated the guideline following the guideline's amendment in January 14 2009. In addition, the Legislative Administrator warned other groups that the guideline 15 barred overnight use of the steps, indicating that the guideline would have been 16 consistently enforced had others tried to violate it. Therefore, defendants failed to show 17 that the guideline was enforced against them, and not against others using the capitol 18 steps overnight, after the LAC amended the guideline.

19 Defendants nonetheless assert that the enforcement of the guideline against 20 them was directed at suppression of their speech in general or the content of their speech 21 in particular. The trial court rejected that argument. Before the Court of Appeals, 22 defendants argued that the trial court had improperly excluded two additional pieces of 1 testimony that could have supported that argument: "the testimony of Burgess, the LAC 2 administrator, regarding whether he was instructed to enforce the rule based on the 3 content of defendants' protest, and the testimony of the LAC co-chairs regarding whether 4 they ever instructed Burgess, the state police, or anybody else to that effect." Babson, 5 249 Or App at 291. The Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's ruling excluding that 6 aspect of the Legislative Administrator's testimony because defendants had failed to 7 make an offer of proof, id. at 292, but the Court of Appeals remanded the case to allow 8 defendants to question the legislator co-chairs of the LAC about "any instructions or 9 other communications that they might have given to or had with the LAC administrator 10 or others regarding enforcement (as opposed to enactment) of the overnight rule." Id. at 11 302, 308 (emphasis in original).

12 On review, defendants argue that the Court of Appeals erred in affirming 13 the exclusion of that portion of the Legislative Administrator's testimony, and the state 14 argues that the Court of Appeals erred in remanding the case for defendants to question 15 the LAC co-chairs. Because that evidence could demonstrate that enforcement of the 16 guideline against defendants was impermissibly directed at their expression, we address 17 each of those pieces of testimony in turn to determine whether the case must be remanded 18 for additional testimony to support defendants' as-applied challenge. If the testimony 19 should not have been excluded, we must determine whether "there was little likelihood 20 that the erroneous exclusion" of the evidence affected the outcome. See State v. Davis, 21 336 Or 19, 32, 77 P3d 1111 (2003).

22 1. The Legislative Administrator's Testimony

1 Generally, when a trial court excludes testimony, a party must make an 2 offer of proof if the party later wants to assign error to that ruling. See OEC 103(1)(b) 3 (explaining that a party can assign error to a ruling excluding evidence if "the substance 4 of the evidence was made known to the court by offer or was apparent from the context
5 within which questions were asked"). This court has explained that one rationale behind 6 that rule is that it "assure[s] that appellate courts are able to determine whether it was 7 error to exclude the evidence and whether any error was likely to have affected the result 8 of the case." State v. Affeld, 307 Or 125, 128, 764 P2d 220 (1988). More importantly for 9 purposes of this case, a second rationale is that the rule "assure[s] that the trial court can 10 make an informed decision." State v. Olmstead, 310 Or 455, 461, 800 P2d 277 (1990).
11 That is, "An offer of proof permits the parties to raise additional arguments, if 12 appropriate, and gives the court an opportunity to reconsider its ruling and correct any 13 error." Id. The rule does not apply when an offer of proof is "impossible because of a 14 trial court's refusal to allow the offer of proof to be made." Affeld, 307 Or at 129.

15 In this case, the Legislative Administrator testified that he probably spoke 16 with Senator Courtney and Representative Gelser regarding their concerns about people 17 being on the steps for 24 hours a day. Defense counsel then sought specifics, and asked 18 the Legislative Administrator, "And what did Representative Gelser say to you about it?"
19 The state objected on hearsay grounds, and the court sustained the objection. Defense 20 counsel argued that the testimony was "not offered to prove the truth," but the trial court 21 stood by its ruling. Defense counsel proceeded to ask the Legislative Administrator the 22 same question about any discussions that he had had with Senator Courtney. The state

1 again objected, and the trial court again sustained the objection. At that point, defense 2 counsel pursued another line of questioning, without making an offer of proof.

3 The state argues that this court cannot review defendants' claim that the trial 4 court improperly excluded the Legislative Administrator's testimony about conversations 5 with legislators because defendants did not make an offer of proof regarding that 6 testimony. Defendants respond that any offer of proof would have been futile because of 7 the trial court's earlier ruling on a separate offer of proof. Specifically, defendants point 8 to defense counsel's earlier questioning of an Oregon State Police officer, during which 9 defense counsel had asked, "You said there was a lot of talk up to that date [of the 10 citations]; what were you referring to?" The trial court sustained a hearsay objection to 11 that question. Defense counsel then proceeded to make an offer of proof by questioning 12 the officer:

13 "Q. * * * [P]lease tell me everyone you talked to about the 14 presence of these Defendants on the steps. * * * Name them.

15 "* * * * *

16 "A. Sergeant Lorimor. * * * Senior Trooper Arnautov, who's here 17 today. Recruit Henshell. Probably just about -- well, I know for a fact that 18 those were involved -- that I talked [to] them. Anybody else I'm not 100-19 percent positive.

20 "Q. Now, did any of them tell you why someone wanted these 21 Defendants to be off the steps?

22 "A. No. Just that that was a safety -- that somebody shouldn't be 23 on there from 11:00 p. to 7 a.

24 "Q. Who told you that?

25 "A. It was during conversation. I don't remember the --

1 "Q. Let's take our time. Who told you --

2 "THE COURT: That's why hearsay's objectionable. And I'm 3 going to sustain it. We're not going to keep going with an offer of proof 4 that's going to get into things that are very, very clearly hearsay."

5 We disagree with defendants' assertion that that colloquy demonstrates that 6 an offer of proof regarding what legislators told the Legislative Administrator would have 7 been futile. The trial court's decision to end the earlier offer of proof does not 8 demonstrate that the trial court would not have allowed any later offer of proof on a 9 similar subject. As noted, one purpose behind the offer of proof requirement is that it 10 "gives the [trial] court an opportunity to reconsider its ruling and correct any error." 11 Olmstead, 310 Or at 461. To the extent that an offer of proof about what legislative 12 leaders told the Legislative Administrator would have been similar to the prior offer of 13 proof about what various state police officers told another state police officer, it would 14 have provided the court with an opportunity to reconsider its prior ruling and "correct any 15 error." Moreover, the offer of proof would have allowed defendants to demonstrate that 16 the proffered testimony did not qualify as hearsay, as defense counsel clearly indicated 17 was his view. As the record stands, however, we cannot determine whether the 18 Legislative Administrator's testimony would have qualified as hearsay or whether the 19 exclusion of that testimony was prejudicial. Thus, because there was no offer of proof, 20 we do not consider the merits of defendants' challenge to the exclusion of that portion of

22 2. The LAC Co-Chairs' Testimony

23 As noted, the other testimony that the trial court excluded was that of the

1 legislator co-chairs of the LAC, Senator Courtney and Representative Hunt. Before trial, 2 defendants subpoenaed the legislator co-chairs of the LAC, but the state filed a motion to 3 quash those subpoenas. The state argued, among other things, that Article IV, section 9, 4 of the Oregon Constitution, the Debate Clause, prevented the court from compelling the 5 legislators to testify, and that defendants had not shown that the legislators' testimony 6 would be material and favorable to defendants' case. The trial court granted the motion 7 to quash, but told defense counsel that, at the conclusion of the first day of trial, the court 8 would "invite [counsel] to tell me why at the conclusion of our evidence today you feel 9 that you have not been able to put on your full case * * * and I'll make a determination at 10 that point whether or not it becomes critical for the subpoenas to be reinstated."

11 At the start of the second day of trial, after the Legislative Administrator 12 had given some of his testimony, defendants requested that the court direct one of the 13 legislator co-chairs to appear in person to testify. The court stated, "I am not prepared 14 based on the evidence heard this far to require Senator Courtney to personally appear."
15 At the end of a lengthy discussion with the parties about the Debate Clause, the court 16 stated, "[T]he order to quash stands. I'm not even going to call Senator Courtney. We'll 17 just assume that he was going to assert a privilege * * *." At that point, defendants 18 requested to make an offer of proof, and the court told them that they could make an offer 19 of proof in the form of a list of questions that would have been asked. Defendants 20 submitted their offer of proof following trial.

21 On review, the state challenges the Court of Appeals' ruling reversing the 22 trial court and allowing defendants to question the legislator co-chairs of the LAC about

1 enforcement of the guideline. See Babson, 249 Or App at 302, 308 ("[D]efendants were 2 entitled to question the legislators, but only about any instructions or other 3 communications that they might have given to or had with the LAC administrator or 4 others regarding enforcement (as opposed to enactment) of the overnight rule."
5 (Emphasis in original.)). The state argues that Article IV, section 9, protects legislators 6 from being compelled to testify or defend lawsuits involving their internal 7 communications and deliberations. In this case, the state argues, any communication 8 between legislator members of the LAC and the Legislative Administrator about 9 enforcement of the guideline was a continuation of internal deliberations of the LAC, 10 which would be protected under Article IV, section 9. Alternatively, the state argues that 11 we need not reach the merits of its Article IV, section 9, argument because defendants 12 failed to make an adequate offer of proof demonstrating that the testimony of the 13 subpoenaed legislators would be material and favorable to their case. Amicus curiae 14 Oregon Legislative Assembly filed a brief in support of the state's arguments.

15 We reject the state's argument that defendants failed to make an adequate 16 offer of proof. Although defendants' failure to make an offer of proof during the 17 Legislative Administrator's testimony prevents us from determining whether that 18 testimony properly was excluded, it does not affect our determination as to the LAC co-19 chairs' testimony. Regardless of what the Legislative Administrator might have said 20 about conversations with legislators during an offer of proof, defendants would not be 21 required to accept that testimony, because the LAC co-chairs could offer contradictory 22 testimony. Moreover, defendants were not able to question the LAC co-chairs for 1 purposes of making an offer of proof because the trial court declined to allow defendants 2 to depose or otherwise obtain testimony from the co-chairs, instead deciding to "assume" 3 that they would assert a privilege. When defendants asked to make an offer of proof, the 4 trial court stated, "I don't know how you'd be able to do that without [Senator Courtney] 5 here." Because defendants were not able to question the LAC co-chairs, their failure to 6 make an offer of proof does not preclude our review. Cf. Olmstead, 310 Or at 461 7 ("When the trial court excludes an entire class of evidence by declaring, in advance, that 8 it is inadmissible as a matter of law, the ruling renders a further offer futile."). Thus, we 9 proceed to consider the state's argument under Article IV, section 9, of the Oregon 10 Constitution.

11 Article IV, section 9, of the Oregon Constitution provides,

12 "Senators and Representatives in all cases, except for treason, 13 felony, or breaches of the peace, shall be privileged from arrest during the 14 session of the Legislative Assembly, and in going to and returning from the 15 same; and shall not be subject to any civil process during the session of the 16 Legislative Assembly, nor during the fifteen days next before the 17 commencement thereof: Nor shall a member for words uttered in debate in 18 either house, be questioned in any other place."

19 This court has never interpreted that provision, so our analysis focuses on the text and on 20 the history surrounding enactment of that provision. See Priest v. Pearce, 314 Or 411, 21 415-16, 840 P2d 65 (1992) (interpreting original provisions of the Oregon Constitution 22 involves analyzing text of provision, history surrounding its enactment, and case law). In 23 undertaking that analysis, our goal is to "determine the meaning of the constitutional 24 wording, informed by general principles that the framers would have understood were 25 being advanced by the adoption of the constitution." State v. Mills, 354 Or 350, 354, 312

1 P3d 515 (2013).

2 a. Text and Context of Article IV, Section 9

3 The only clause of Article IV, section 9, at issue on review states, "Nor 4 shall a member for words uttered in debate in either house, be questioned in any other 5 place." Although "words uttered in debate" could include a variety of communications, 6 both spoken and written, the text narrows the clause's protection to "words uttered in 7 debate in either house." Or Const, Art IV, § 9 (emphasis added); see Noah Webster, 2 An 8 American Dictionary of the English Language (unpaginated) (1828) (defining "word" to 9 include "[a]n articulate or vocal sound * * * uttered by the human voice" and "[t]he letter 10 or letters, written or printed, which represent a sound or combination of sounds"); id.
11 (defining "uttered" as "[s]poken; pronounced; disclosed; published; put into circulation"); 12 Webster, 1 An American Dictionary of the English Language (unpaginated) (defining 13 noun "debate" as "[c]ontention in words or arguments; discussion for elucidating truth; 14 strife in argument or reasoning, between persons of different opinions, each endeavoring 15 to prove his own opinion right, and that of his opposer wrong; dispute; controversy").
16 The text "in either house" could confine the privilege to communications that occur in a 17 particular place, but an examination of the word "house," in context, reveals a different 18 focus.

19 Definitions of the word "house" from around the time that the Oregon 20 Constitution was adopted suggest a figurative use for the term, referring to the legislature 21 as an institution. See Webster, 1 An American Dictionary of the English Language 22 (unpaginated) (defining "house," as relevant here, as "a body of men united in their

1 legislative capacity, and holding their place by right or by election" and noting that, in 2 "most of the United States, the legislatures consist of two houses, the senate, and the 3 house of representatives or delegates" (emphasis in original)); John Bouvier, 1 A Law 4 Dictionary 471 (1839) ("House is used figuratively to signify a collection of persons as 5 the house of representatives[.]"). Other provisions of the Oregon Constitution also use
6 the word "house" to refer to the legislature as an institution. See, e.g., Or Const, Art IV, §
7 11 ("Each house when assembled, shall choose its own officers, judge of the election, 8 qualifications, and returns of its own members * * * but neither house shall without the 9 concurrence of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than 10 that in which it may be sitting."); Or Const, Art IV, § 14 ("The deliberations of each 11 house, of committees of each house or joint committees and of committees of the whole, 12 shall be open."). When viewed in those terms, the Debate Clause applies to 13 communications that occur when "a collection of persons," that is, legislators, are "united 14 in their legislative capacity." In other words, the privilege applies when legislators are 15 communicating in carrying out their legislative functions.

16 The other clauses of Article IV, section 9, support that interpretation 17 because their protections apply when the legislature is in session -- or shortly before or 18 after the session -- and, thus, when legislators generally are engaging in legislative 19 functions. The other clauses of Article IV, section 9, protect legislators from arrest 20 "during the session of the Legislative Assembly, and in going to and returning from the 21 same" and from civil process "during the session of the Legislative Assembly" and 22 "during the fifteen days next before the commencement thereof." Or Const, Art IV, § 9.

1 Although the protections of those clauses extend beyond the legislative session, they 2 appear to do so only to the extent necessary to allow legislators to perform legislative 3 functions, either by allowing them to come and go from the session without being 4 impeded by arrest or by allowing them to avoid civil process right before they go to the 5 session to perform their legislative role.⁹

6 In its focus on allowing legislators to carry out their legislative functions 7 during a session of the Legislative Assembly, Article IV, section 9, when viewed as a 8 whole, appears to serve two related purposes. The provision allows legislators to perform 9 their legislative functions without being interrupted or distracted by arrest, civil process, 10 or other questioning. It also allows legislators to perform their legislative functions 11 without fear of retribution in the form of "be[ing] questioned in any other place" by either 12 another branch of government or the public. In providing those protections, the Debate 13 Clause preserves legislative integrity and independence. See United States v. Johnson, 14 383 US 169, 178, 86 S Ct 749, 15 L Ed 2d 681 (1966) (noting that the Speech or Debate 15 Clause is "an important protection of the independence and integrity of the legislature").¹⁰

16 b. History Surrounding Adoption of Article IV, Section 9

⁹ Amicus argues that the Debate Clause is not similarly temporally limited. We do not address that issue in this case because we resolve the parties' dispute on other grounds.

¹⁰ Although federal cases decided after the Oregon Constitution was adopted are not controlling authority in our interpretation of Article IV, section 9, because of the similar wording and similar origins of the federal Speech or Debate Clause, federal cases provide a useful perspective.

1 Concerns about legislative independence were the foundation for the 2 speech or debate clause that originated in England and that later was adopted in the 3 colonies, in the United States Constitution,¹¹ and in many states. United States v.
4 Brewster, 408 US 501, 507-08, 92 S Ct 2531, 33 L Ed 2d 507 (1972) (noting that the 5 English Speech or Debate Clause arose out of a struggle for parliamentary supremacy, 6 and the American Speech or Debate Clause "was designed to preserve legislative 7 independence"); Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 US 367, 372-75, 71 S Ct 783, 95 L Ed 1019 8 (1951) (describing history of federal Speech or Debate Clause, from its roots in the 9 English Bill of Rights, to being "taken as a matter of course" in the colonies, to inclusion 10 in the Articles of Confederation, in the United States Constitution, and in many state 11 constitutions). Moreover, speech or debate clauses were incorporated into the federal 12 constitution and state constitutions at a time when there were fears about legislative 13 excess. See Tenney, 341 US at 375 ("It is significant that legislative freedom was so 14 carefully protected by constitutional framers at a time when even Jefferson expressed fear 15 of legislative excess."). The fact that speech or debate clauses generally were adopted at 16 a time when there were concerns about the scope of legislative power suggests that the 17 framers intended to preserve legislative independence while limiting the protections of 18 the Debate Clause to communications associated with performing legislative functions.

¹¹ Article I, section 6, of the United States Constitution provides, in part, that "for any Speech or Debate in either House, [the Senators and Representatives] shall not be questioned in any other Place."

1 We cannot say with certainty what prompted the Oregon framers to include 2 the Debate Clause in the Oregon Constitution, however, because there was no reported 3 debate about the clause at Oregon's constitutional convention. See Claudia Burton, A 4 Legislative History of the Oregon Constitution of 1857 -- Part II (Frame of Government: 5 Articles III-VII), 39 Willamette L Rev 245, 286-87 (2003) (so stating). The historical 6 record does reveal some modification of the clause, but without any recorded debate, we 7 cannot draw much meaning from the record. For example, Matthew Deady proposed an 8 amendment to add the words "provided such speech had been actually made during a 9 session of said house," which may have been an attempt to narrow the clause to cover 10 only spoken words. Id. at 286. That amendment was defeated without recorded debate, 11 however, so there is no indication whether the framers intended a broader meaning or 12 assumed that such an addition was unnecessary because it would be redundant. We 13 similarly do not place much weight on the change made to the text as introduced, 14 substituting "words uttered in debate" for "any speech or debate," because that change 15 also was made without discussion or explanation. Id. at 287 (noting change and inferring 16 that it likely "was intended simply as a linguistic improvement"); see Steven F. Huefner, 17 The Neglected Value of the Legislative Privilege in State Legislatures, 45 Wm & Mary L
18 Rev 221, 239 (2003) (noting that textual differences in speech or debate clauses adopted 19 in different states "appear to reflect stylistic adjustments in the phrasing of the privilege, 20 more than substantive differences in the nature of the privilege"). Thus, the record of the 21 Oregon constitutional convention adds little to the analysis.

22 Our review of the history is not so limited, however, because at the time

1 that the Oregon Constitution was adopted, there was an "authoritative case" interpreting a 2 similar clause in the Massachusetts Constitution, Coffin v. Coffin, 4 Mass 1 (1808). See 3 Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 US 168, 204, 26 L Ed 377 (1880) (describing Coffin as 4 perhaps "the most authoritative case in this country on the construction of the provision 5 in regard to freedom of debate in legislative bodies" and concluding that the case was "of 6 much weight" because it was decided shortly after adoption of the federal constitution); 7 Yancy v. Shatzer, 337 Or 345, 362, 97 P3d 1161 (2004) (discussing the "prevailing view 8 throughout the American legal landscape in 1857" in interpreting a provision of the 9 Oregon Constitution). In fact, Coffin appears to be the only case to have interpreted a 10 speech or debate clause prior to adoption of the Oregon Constitution. See Huefner, 45 11 Wm & Mary L Rev at 233, 233 n 35 (noting that no other American cases discussing the 12 legislative privilege existed by 1880, except cases discussing a common-law privilege for 13 local government legislators).

14 In Coffin, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court described that state's 15 Speech and Debate Clause as having a broad scope, but the court concluded that the 16 clause did not protect the speech at issue in that case.¹² The case involved an action for 17 slander against a state legislator for statements he made in the legislative chamber while

¹² The Speech and Debate Clause that the court interpreted read, "The freedom of deliberation, speech and debate, in either house of the legislature, is so essential to the rights of the people, that it cannot be the foundation of any accusation or prosecution, action or complaint, in any other court or place whatsoever." Mass Const, Part I, Art XXI.

1 the legislature was in session. Another legislator had moved for a resolution appointing 2 an additional notary at the urging of the plaintiff, who was not a legislator but was 3 present for the legislative session. Coffin, 4 Mass at 24. While the resolution was under 4 consideration, the defendant asked the legislator where he had gotten the information on 5 which the resolution was based, and the legislator answered, "from a respectable 6 gentleman from Nantucket." Id. The speaker then took up other business, and the 7 defendant approached the legislator in the chamber passageway to ask who the 8 "respectable gentleman" was. When the legislator pointed to the plaintiff as the source of 9 his information, the defendant said, "What, that convict?" Id. When told that the 10 plaintiff had been acquitted of the crime to which the defendant was referring, the 11 defendant stated, "That did not make him less guilty, thee knows." Id. at 25. In the 12 subsequent slander trial, the jury found in the plaintiff's favor. Id. at 26.

13 In considering the defendant's claim that he was protected from prosecution 14 by the Speech and Debate Clause, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court began by 15 explaining that the clause was intended to "support the rights of the people, by enabling 16 their representatives to execute the functions of their office without fear of prosecutions, 17 civil or criminal." Id. at 27. Given that purpose behind the clause, the court concluded 18 that it should be construed liberally. Id. Along those lines, the court stated that it would 19 not confine the scope of the clause to "delivering an opinion, uttering a speech, or 20 haranguing in debate" and it instead "extend[ed] it to the giving of a vote, to the making 21 of a written report, and to every other act resulting from the nature, and in the execution, 22 of the office." Id. (emphasis added). Rather than limiting application of the clause to a

1 particular type of communication or to "the walls of the representatives' chamber," the 2 court construed the clause to extend to "the exercise of the functions of [the legislative] 3 office" while the legislature was in session. Id. at 27-28. The court went so far as to state 4 that it would not inquire into "whether the exercise [of the legislative function] was 5 regular according to the rules of the house, or irregular and against their rules." Id. at 27.
6 Nonetheless, the court did envision limits on the privilege, most notably that the privilege 7 would not apply "[w]hen a representative is not acting as a member of the house." Id. at 8 28.

9 Applying that understanding, the court concluded that the defendant 10 legislator was not protected by the Speech and Debate Clause. Although the court 11 explained that the privilege would apply if the legislator had spoken defamatory words 12 "in the execution of his official duty," the court concluded that the defendant had not 13 "even contemplated that he was in the discharge of any official duty" when he referred to 14 the plaintiff's prior alleged crime. Id. at 30-31. In particular, the court noted that, when 15 the defendant made his comments, the resolution supported by the plaintiff was no longer 16 before the house, the house had proceeded to consider other issues, the defendant did not 17 call for reconsideration of the resolution, and the plaintiff was not a candidate for the 18 notary position that was the subject of the resolution. Id. at 29-30. Thus, the court 19 concluded that the defendant was not protected by the privilege. Id. at 36.

20 The court's interpretation in Coffin is in line with the text and context of 21 Article IV, section 9, because it emphasizes the legislative function in determining the 22 acts to which the Debate Clause applies. Here, even defendants agree that legislative

1 functions are at the core of what is protected by the Debate Clause. The more difficult 2 question is what falls within the scope of legislative functions protected by the privilege.
3 See Brewster, 408 US at 515-16 (noting that interpretations of the federal Speech or 4 Debate Clause have not "treated the Clause as protecting all conduct relating to the 5 legislative process" and instead have been limited to "an act which was clearly a part of 6 the legislative process -- the due functioning of the process" (emphasis in original)).

7 c. Scope of Oregon's Debate Clause

8 We need not define the precise contours of the privilege in this case 9 because on review, defendants have narrowed the information that they seek from the co-10 chairs of the LAC. As defendants note, the Court of Appeals held that defendants were 11 entitled to question the LAC co-chairs about "any instructions or other communications 12 that they might have given to or had with the LAC administrator or others regarding 13 enforcement (as opposed to enactment) of the overnight rule." Babson, 249 Or App at 14 302 (emphasis in original). Defendants did not challenge the court's limitation on 15 defendants' questioning to matters involving enforcement. Instead, the state challenged 16 the court's determination that defendants could question the LAC co-chairs at all in this 17 case. Thus, the only question on review is whether defendants may question the LAC co-18 chairs about enforcement of the guideline. We conclude that they can because the 19 enforcement of laws is outside the scope of the legislative function and because there was 20 testimony from the Legislative Administrator that he had, in fact, had conversations with 21 the LAC co-chairs about the guideline.

22 The Oregon Constitution vests the legislative power of the state in the 1 Legislative Assembly, and the executive power of the state in the Governor. Or Const, 2 Art IV, § 1(1) ("The legislative power of the state * * * is vested in a Legislative 3 Assembly, consisting of a Senate and a House of Representatives."); Or Const, Art V, § 1 4 ("The cheif [sic] executive power of the State, shall be vested in a Governor[.]"). Not 5 only does the constitution forbid members from one branch from exercising the functions 6 of another branch, but to the extent that the legislature has enforcement powers, those 7 powers are explicitly set forth in the constitution. See Or Const, Art III, § 1 ("[N]o 8 person charged with official duties under one of these [three] branches, shall exercise any 9 of the functions of another, except as in this Constitution expressly provided."); Or Const, 10 Art IV, § 16 (providing that either house, during its session, may "punish by 11 imprisonment, any person, not a member, who shall have been guilty of disrespect to the 12 house by disorderly or contemptious [sic] behavior in its presence"). Because 13 enforcement is not generally part of the legislative function, extending the privilege to 14 legislators' participation in some aspect of enforcement of a law would not serve the 15 clause's purpose of allowing legislators to perform their legislative role without 16 interruption or fear of retribution. We therefore conclude that legislative members who 17 participate in or specifically direct enforcement of a law against particular individuals 18 may be questioned about that conduct because it is not protected under the Debate Clause

19 of Article IV, section 9.¹³

¹³ The state does not appear to dispute that conclusion. The state argued in its brief that "had President Courtney and Representative Hunt reached out to any executive

1 In this case, however, the enforcement related to the legislature's control 2 over the state capitol building, making the line between enactment and enforcement more 3 difficult to draw. Amicus argues that controlling legislative property is a legislative act, 4 even if control of legislative property requires enforcement of internal legislative rules.
5 In support of that argument, amicus cites two federal cases where courts held that those 6 who enforced internal rules governing access to the house floor and congressional 7 galleries were protected by the legislative privilege. See National Ass'n of Social 8 Workers v. Harwood, 69 F3d 622, 631-32 (1st Cir 1995) (concluding that common law 9 legislative immunity extends to legislators and their aides who are "enforcing [a] rule as a 10 part of their official duties," where rule involved access of certain lobbyists to House 11 floor); Consumers U. of U.S. v. Periodical Corr. Ass'n, 515 F2d 1341, 1350-51 (DC Cir

official or agency about the [guideline], for instance, by directly calling Oregon State Police to arrest defendants, those actions might not fall within Article IV, section 9's scope." The state argues that that conclusion does not control the outcome here, however, because there is no evidence that the legislators reached out to any executive agency and because any communications that they did have were with the Legislative Administrator, who "was simply an extension of the legislators." As an initial matter, defendants are not bound by the lack of evidence about whether the legislators reached out to an executive agency, where the testimony of the legislators might provide that missing evidence. More importantly, the state's argument misconstrues the legislative function inquiry. The question is not who the legislators communicated with, but the function of the communication. Many of the legislators' conversations with the Legislative Administrator would be protected by Article IV, section 9, to the extent that they related to the enactment or amendment of the guideline. To the extent that the individual legislators directed the Legislative Administrator to direct the Oregon State Police to enforce the guideline in a particular way, however, that conversation would not be protected merely because the legislators used the Legislative Administrator as an intermediary in directing the executive agency to enforce the guideline in a particular way.

1 1975), cert den, 423 US 1051 (1976) (concluding that "enforcing internal rules of 2 Congress validly enacted under authority specifically granted to the Congress" is 3 protected by the Speech or Debate Clause where rules involved access to congressional 4 galleries).

5 Where internal rules govern the ability of the legislature to function, by, for 6 example, regulating who has access to the house floor during debates, enforcement of 7 those rules may be protected by the Debate Clause. In contrast, here, the guideline did 8 not involve access to the floor of the legislature or the galleries and instead regulated use 9 of the capitol steps, which are removed from where legislators generally engage in 10 "debate." There is no indication that enforcement of the guideline against defendants was 11 necessary to prevent interference with any legislative function. In addition, enforcement 12 of the guideline was not carried out by a legislative employee. Rather, executive officials 13 -- the Oregon State Police -- carried out enforcement, which resulted in citations for 14 trespass. In this case, therefore, if individual legislators directed enforcement of the 15 guideline against defendants, we think that they acted outside the legislative function of 16 controlling legislative property.

17 We recognize that the line between enactment and enforcement may be 18 difficult to draw in other cases as well. As the state notes, legislators enacting or 19 amending a law often will consider the practical implications involved in enforcing a law.
20 Similarly, after a law is enacted, legislators may want to understand how it is being 21 enforced to determine whether a law should be amended or repealed. To the extent that 22 legislators seek information about how a law would be or is being enforced, for purposes

1 of enacting or amending legislation, those communications likely would be protected by 2 the Debate Clause. When legislators become involved in actually directing or carrying 3 out enforcement of a law, however, and they do so outside the process of enacting or 4 amending a law, they cannot turn to the Debate Clause to shield their activities. Compare
5 Kilbourn, 103 US at 200, 204-05 (concluding that legislators, who passed an invalid 6 resolution directing house speaker to issue warrant for Kilbourn's arrest, were protected 7 by Speech or Debate Clause because offering and voting on resolution are protected by 8 that clause), with Gravel v. United States, 408 US 606, 625, 92 S Ct 2614, 33 L Ed 2d 9 583 (1972) ("Members of Congress are constantly in touch with the Executive Branch of 10 the Government and with administrative agencies -- they may cajole, and exhort with 11 respect to the administration of a federal statute -- but such conduct, though generally 12 done, is not protected legislative activity."). We think that trial courts can make the 13 determination in the first instance as to whether questions seek to obtain information 14 about legislative functions.

15 Here, the trial court granted the state's motion to quash the subpoenas of the 16 LAC co-chairs and the court assumed that the legislators would assert the legislative 17 privilege in response to defendants' questions. The trial court erred in its determination 18 because the legislators could not have asserted the privilege in response to questions 19 about their direct involvement, if any, in enforcing the guideline. Although Senator 20 Courtney and Representative Hunt each filed affidavits stating that they did not witness 21 defendants' arrests or interactions with state police, those affidavits do not address 22 whether either legislator directed the Legislative Administrator or the state police to carry

1 out those arrests or other citations. In addition, although the Legislative Administrator 2 testified that he never received any information from the LAC co-chairs about how they 3 wanted him to address the vigil, he also testified that he spoke to them about the 4 guideline, and he answered numerous questions by stating that he could not remember 5 whether certain conversations or interactions had occurred. Defendants are not required 6 to accept that testimony where testimony from the LAC co-chairs, if it contradicted or 7 was inconsistent with the Legislative Administrator's testimony, likely could have 8 affected the trial court's determination about whether the enforcement was based on the 9 content of defendants' expression. See Davis, 336 Or at 32 (stating that court will affirm 10 trial court if "there was little likelihood that the erroneous exclusion" of evidence affected 11 the outcome).

12 We emphasize that Article IV, section 9, is essential to the legislative 13 function and that the judicial process must not be allowed to improperly intrude on the 14 legislative process or unnecessarily burden the time and actions of individual legislators.
15 The fact that limited inquiries of legislators are permitted in a case such as this, 16 notwithstanding Article IV, section 9, does not countenance fishing expeditions or 17 harassment of legislators by parties in civil or criminal matters. Here, however, the 18 information that defendants seek clearly relates to the enforcement, rather than the 19 enactment, of the guideline, and evidence in the record indicates that the legislators who 20 were subpoenaed had conversations with the Legislative Administrator regarding the 21 guideline. For those reasons, we remand to allow defendants to question the LAC co-22 chairs about their involvement, if any, in enforcing the guideline against defendants.

1 III. ARTICLE I, SECTION 26, OF THE OREGON CONSTITUTION

2 Article I, section 26, of the Oregon Constitution provides, "No law shall be 3 passed restraining any of the inhabitants of the State from assembling together in a 4 peaceable manner to consult for their common good; nor from instructing their 5 Representatives; nor from applying to the Legislature for redress of greivances [sic]." In 6 Illig-Renn, this court stated that Article I, section 26, is subject to the same analytical 7 framework as Article I, section 8. 341 Or at 236. Because the parties agree that the 8 Robertson framework controls the analysis of Article I, section 26, we will apply that 9 framework for purposes of this opinion. Accordingly, similarly to the inquiry under 10 Article I, section 8, we must determine whether the guideline is "written in terms" 11 directed at restricting assembling, instructing representatives, and applying for redress of 12 grievances; whether the guideline prohibits those activities as a means of causing some 13 harm; or whether the guideline is focused only on restricting harmful effects.

14 In applying the Robertson framework, defendants note that the shorthand 15 "assembly" is inadequate to refer to the rights protected by Article I, section 26, because 16 there are three distinct rights protected by that provision: inhabitants of the state have the 17 right to "assembl[e] together in a peaceable manner to consult for their common good," 18 "instruct[] their Representatives," and "apply[] to the Legislature for redress of greivances 19 [sic]." Or Const, Art I, § 26. Defendants provide an historical analysis of all three of 20 those rights, and argue that, although the guideline implicates all three rights, it 21 particularly impacts defendants' rights to instruct their representatives and to apply for 22 redress of grievances. Based on that analysis, defendants argue that the guideline is 1 unconstitutional on its face under Article I, section 26, because the guideline, by its 2 terms, restricts activities protected under that provision. Defendants also argue that the 3 guideline is unconstitutional under Article I, section 26, under the third category of 4 Robertson as applied to their conduct because they did not cause any harm when they 5 engaged in protected activities.

6 The state responds that the guideline is valid on its face under Article I, 7 section 26, for the same reasons that it is valid on its face under Article I, section 8.
8 According to the state, the guideline does not, by its terms, target any of the rights 9 protected under Article I, section 26, and it is not overbroad because it restricts those 10 rights only in one location and only for a limited period of time each day. In addition, the 11 state asserts that application of the guideline to defendants did not violate Article I, 12 section 26, because the guideline was enforced based on defendants' conduct of 13 trespassing, and not based on the fact that they were assembling, instructing their 14 representatives, or applying for redress of grievances.

15 The Court of Appeals agreed with defendants that they were engaging in 16 activity protected by Article I, section 26, when they were cited, but noted that that fact 17 did not mean that their Article I, section 26, rights had been violated. Babson, 249 Or 18 App at 305. The court went on to explain that the guideline is "assembly neutral" 19 because it "does not expressly mention" or necessarily implicate any of the activities 20 protected under Article I, section 26. Id. at 306. The court explained that, although the 21 guideline prohibits presence on the capitol steps, "presence is not necessarily assembly 22 for the common good," and, in fact, "is not even necessarily assembly" if only a single

1 person is present. Id. Moreover, the guideline did not mention or necessarily implicate 2 the right to instruct representatives or apply for redress of grievances. Id. at 307. Thus, 3 the court concluded, defendants were left to challenge the guideline under Article I, 4 section 26, as applied to their conduct under the third category of Robertson, and the 5 court remanded on that issue. Id. at 307-08.

6 A. Robertson Category One and Category Two

7 In this case, analysis of the guideline under the first two categories of the 8 Robertson framework does not require this court to further explore the meaning and 9 scope of Article I, section 26, because, whatever the meaning and scope of that provision, 10 the guideline's restriction on "[o]vernight use" of the capitol steps is not, by its terms, 11 directed at assembling, instructing representatives, or applying for redress of grievances.
12 Nor does the text of the guideline expressly or obviously include those rights as an 13 element or "proscribed means" of causing a targeted harm.

14 In contrast, in Ausmus, the disorderly conduct statute at issue criminalized, 15 in certain circumstances, "[c]ongregat[ing] with other persons in a public place and 16 refus[ing] to comply with a lawful order of the police to disperse." Ausmus, 336 Or at 17 498 (quoting former ORS 166.025(1)(e) (2003), repealed by Or Laws 2012, ch 35, §1) 18 (alteration added). The parties and the court readily concluded that the element of 19 "[c]ongregat[ing] with other persons in a public place" described conduct protected by 20 Article I, section 26, of the Oregon Constitution. Id. at 500. Here, the word "use" in the 21 guideline does not lead to a similar conclusion. The fact that the word "use" can include 22 or apply to the rights protected under Article I, section 26, does not mean that the

1 guideline is directed, in terms, at those rights or that those rights are a proscribed means 2 of causing a harm identified in the guideline. We agree with the Court of Appeals that 3 the guideline on overnight use "prohibits presence on the capitol steps, but presence is 4 not necessarily assembly for the common good," nor is it necessarily instructing 5 representatives or applying for redress of grievances. Babson, 249 Or App at 306-07
6 (emphasis in original). A single person crossing the steps between 11:00 p.m. and 7:00 7 a.m. would violate the guideline, as would the mere storage of basketball equipment on 8 the steps. The guideline is not directed, in terms, at the rights protected under Article I, 9 section 26, and it does not expressly or obviously include those rights as a proscribed 10 means of causing some harm. The guideline therefore survives scrutiny under the first 11 two categories of Robertson.

12 B. Robertson Category Three

13 As noted, our analysis under the third category of Robertson requires us to 14 determine whether enforcement of the guideline impermissibly burdened defendants' 15 rights under Article I, section 26, of the Oregon Constitution. Defendants appear to argue 16 that, because they did not cause any harm to the capitol or any other property or persons, 17 the guideline could not constitutionally be applied to their protected conduct. In other 18 words, defendants seem to suggest that the government cannot enforce the guideline in a 19 way that restricts their rights under Article I, section 26, unless they are causing 20 "discernible harm."

21 That argument assumes that a restriction on the time of use intended to 22 prevent harm to persons or property may be applied only when harm occurs. That is

1 incorrect. See Tidyman, 306 Or at 189 ("If retail business is excluded from a residential 2 zone to keep down heavy traffic and noise, the exclusion bars an antique store that 3 attracts only a half dozen quiet visitors a day.").

4 Here, the guideline is a restriction on location and timing: "Overnight use 5 of the steps is prohibited, and activities on the steps may be conducted only between 7:00 6 am and 11:00 pm, or during hours between 11:00 pm and 7:00 am when legislative 7 hearings or floor sessions are taking place." Enforcement of the guideline in the absence 8 of harm does not necessarily demonstrate that defendants' Article I, section 26, rights 9 were targeted or impermissibly burdened. Instead, as we explain below, we must 10 determine whether the enforcement was a reasonable restriction on the time, place, and 11 manner of defendants' exercise of their Article I, section 26, rights.

12 For the reasons set forth in our analysis of the guideline under Article I, 13 section 8, enforcement of the guideline against defendants advanced legitimate state 14 interests in safety, security, and aesthetics, and left open ample alternative avenues for 15 defendants to exercise their Article I, section 26, rights. We must separately examine, 16 however, whether enforcement of the guideline was "neutral," in the sense that the 17 government's enforcement of the law was not directed at restricting defendants' rights 18 under Article I, section 26. As stated above, however, we cannot resolve that issue on 19 review because we have concluded that the trial court erred in granting the motion to 20 quash the subpoenas of the LAC co-chairs. For the reasons outlined above, the trial court 21 must determine whether enforcement of the guideline was neutral after it has had an 22 opportunity to hear testimony from the LAC co-chairs about their role, if any, in 1 enforcing the guideline against defendants.

2 IV. THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION

3 The First Amendment provides, in part, that "Congress shall make no law * 4 * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably 5 to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." The First 6 Amendment is made applicable to the states by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth 7 Amendment. Gitlow v. New York, 268 US 652, 666, 45 S Ct 625, 69 L Ed 1138 (1925).

8 As noted, defendants argued before the trial court and the Court of Appeals 9 that the guideline violates the First Amendment. The trial court rejected that argument, 10 and the Court of Appeals declined to reach the First Amendment issue, reasoning that 11 "any opinion [it] might render based on the First and Fourteenth Amendments would be 12 premature" because the court had not yet determined "whether the state's law * * * ha[d] 13 deprived defendants of the rights they [sought] to vindicate under the United States 14 Constitution." Babson, 249 Or App at 307. The Court of Appeals based that conclusion 15 on this court's well-established "first things first" doctrine. Id. at 307, 307 n 6. As this 16 court has explained, "first things first" requires the court to consider state law claims first 17 because "the state does not deny any right claimed under the federal Constitution when 18 the claim before the court in fact is fully met by state law." Sterling v. Cupp, 290 Or 611, 19 614, 625 P2d 123 (1981).

20 On review, defendants argue that, at least for some federal constitutional 21 violations, "first things first" is no longer viable, citing Zinerman v. Burch, 494 US 113, 22 125, 110 S Ct 975, 108 L Ed 2d 100 (1990), in which the United States Supreme Court

1 stated that certain federal constitutional violations are "complete when the wrongful 2 action is taken." We need not address defendants' argument, however. Even if we 3 assume that defendants are correct that we are not required to resolve state law claims 4 before reaching federal law claims -- a matter we do not decide here -- there are sound 5 reasons for doing so. See Wallace P. Carson, Jr., "Last Things Last": A Methodological 6 Approach to Legal Arguments in State Courts, 19 Willamette L Rev 641, 648-49 (1983) 7 (advocating first resolving claims under state constitutional law, before addressing 8 federal constitutional law, to provide stability, allow for independent state protection of 9 individual rights, and eliminate guesswork on how the United States Supreme Court will 10 interpret the federal constitution). Because defendants' state law claims are unresolved, 11 we decline to address defendants' First Amendment argument.

12 V. CONCLUSION

13 Article I, section 8, is a "very broad prohibition" on restraints on 14 expression, and its "sweeping terms" extend to the kind of vigil defendants engaged in 15 here and even to "the kinds of expression that a majority of citizens in many communities 16 would dislike." State v. Ciancanelli, 339 Or 282, 293, 311, 121 P3d 613 (2005).
17 Moreover, we recognize the social and personal value of protest and, often, of protest at a 18 particular time and place -- such as a continuous peace vigil at the state capitol. A good 19 argument can be made that the legislature should permit such vigils as part of the public 20 debate over contested state policies. The question here, however, is whether the Oregon 21 Constitution bars the legislature from limiting use of the capitol steps for any purpose, 22 including protesting, to the hours of 7:00 a.m. to 11:00 p.m. (except when legislative

1 hearings or floor sessions are taking place). It does not. Our cases teach that the fact that 2 expression is protected does not mean that it is exempt from content-neutral, speech-3 neutral laws and regulations. See Tidyman, 306 Or at 182 ("A regulation is not always 4 unconstitutional because it restricts one's choice of a place or time for self-expression * *
5 * when that is not the object of the regulation."). Applying that same analysis, the rights
6 protected under Article I, section 26, similarly are not exempt from neutral laws that do 7 not target assembling, instructing representatives, or applying for redress of grievances.
8 The Oregon Constitution does not prohibit the government -- in this case, the Legislative 9 Administration Committee -- from enacting laws in terms that do not target speech or the 10 rights protected under Article I, section 26, even if those laws may have some incidental 11 impact those rights, as the guideline at issue here does.

12 For the reasons discussed above, on its face, the guideline does not violate 13 Article I, section 8, or Article I, section 26, of the Oregon Constitution. The case must be 14 remanded, however, to permit defendants to question the co-chairs of the LAC about 15 their role, if any, in enforcing the guideline against defendants. Based on that testimony 16 and the other testimony presented, the trial court must determine whether enforcement of 17 the guideline was a reasonable restriction on the time, place, and manner of defendants' 18 expression and assembly, or whether it targeted defendants because they were engaged in 19 expression and assembly, and therefore violated Article I, section 8, and Article I, section 20 26, as applied to defendants. Because of our resolution of that issue, we do not reach 21 defendants' First Amendment argument.

22 The decision of the Court of Appeals is affirmed. The judgment of the

- 1 circuit court is affirmed in part and reversed in part, and the case is remanded for further
- 2 proceedings.
